CHAPTER II.

Although she was a girl of quick decisions, Jill Merridew had a mind which, on the matter of clothes, was as changeabe as that of any other woman. She had no special wish to being well read, and her twomans. She had no special wish to being well read, and her mind responded even to this slight solatium.

as changeabe as that of any other woman. She had no special wish to please her strange caller. It was more to please herself that she sat pensively on lir bed making a rapid survey of her wardrobe.

Her bedroom was a happy combination of the old and the new. Its effect was mainly black and white, for the ceiling was supported by great rough beams which clearly proclaimed that Elizabethan origin of the 'arm. It was a setting with which no color could clash, and the orange coverlet on her bed seemed strangely, if not daringly suitable. All the furniture was of the same period as the farm, though an inspection of the four poster would have shown that it had been fitted with a modern spring matterss. Jill had no objection to interfering with antiquity in order to ensure comfort.
