And Poor Alike

Santa Claus, a composite figure of lean and fat, short and long, but always rosy-cheeked and chuckling, is abroad again in the land.

In dozens of Canadian cities and towns, this scene is repeated:

Excited chileton push and pull at restrained parents. Father wears Bond Street clothes, an imported Ulster, or he wears grimy jeans and a self-effacing sheepish grin.

Mother wears a fur coat, or shivers in someone's discarded finery not intended for either season or the weather.

A band swings down the street, martial music fills the air, the Drum Major's shake sweeps the sky above the throng. It's been a hard, troublous year for rich and poor, and father is determined not to be too much impressed.

A ripple runs through the crowd. The King approaches — in red and white whiskers.

"Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha-at" he booms without restraint. His red velvet all but sparkles in the early winter sunshine. His cheeks are resy from the cool air.

"Well, well and well, hullo there. Sonny,' he shouts with an encompassing wave of a short fat arm.

A startled, wondrous smile grows into being. Santa has spoken—to Son. Father looks at Sonny's face. The banal notes and heavy discords of want and riches are alike forgotten. Father is a sale solutions.
