So-Called Children's Diseases

Youngsters Don't Have to Have These Illnesses Peculiar to Little Ones—Unfortunately Too Many Parents Have This Erroneous Belief

Good constitutions are the best bet against disease. It is the old story of prevention being better than cure. But building up bodies is not all there is to prevention. It often comes down to actual cases and then the mother must act quickly and positively. Namely, keeping a child away from sick or "getting-sick" children and keeping them away from them.

In winter it is comparatively simple to keep little neighbors apart, but in summer it is next to impossible. Children need companions to play with from the time they can walk. But these play ramps do have their hazards.

Safer in Open Air
One child taking whooping cough, measles or one of the contagious diseases can give it to the whole neighborhood.

In the open air there is more chance of the children escaping contagion than if they were together in a close room, but open air does not always mean immunity. Little children have a habit of handling each other's toys and it is pitting their hands to their mouths, or noses. They take bites off mutual apples and pass around lollypops like loving cups for each to take a lick.

It is not necessary to dwell on the difference between contagion and infection. One certain thing, however, can easily be remembered. Never let your child get a sick child's breath, never let him touch him, and never allow him to handle anything handled by the other child—eat off his dishes, drink out of his cup, put his toys in his mouth, or use his handkerchiefs.

Study Effect Of Movies

American Teachers Report on Research During Past Year

Detroit.—How educators have turned neighborhood movie theaters into laboratories to learn the motion picture habits of boys and girls was revealed recently at the twenty-third annual meeting of the National Council of Teachers of English. It was declared that nation-wide tests conducted during the last year indicate that the rising generation of theatergoers will eventually elevate the standards of the entire film industry.

Results of photoplay appreciation experiments were presented by Mr. William Lewin of Weequahic High School, Newark, N.J. He declared that "pupils under guidance show as much aptitude in reporting on the merits of films that have influenced their behavior, their influence being in the direction of better ideals."

He added that "if our millions of high school students can be taught standards for judging motion pictures, it is likely that a movement to make boys and girls intelligently critical of current photoplays would succeed in raising the level of taste among motion picturegoers."

Mr. Lewin's report created such a profound impression that it was discussed wherever groups of the 1,000 educators gathered. It was recommended at the general session recently:

1. That units of instruction be introduced into the nation's schools, with a view to improving by mass education, popular standards of taste and judgment in relation to motion pictures;

2. That a committee of English teachers regularly preview selected current photoplays, with a view to suggesting which productions are worthy of consideration in the classroom;

3. That courses in methods of teaching photoplay appreciation be included in the curricula of schools of education;

4. That further experimentation be arranged, with a view to formulating definite criteria in harmony with those of English teachers for evaluating photoplays.

Jill of the Fields

A ROMANCE
By Kennaway James

SYNOPSIS.
Motherless Jill Merrifield becomes, on the death of her father, owner of a considerable farm. She decides to take her father's place. She counts on Mark Denbridge, head man, to assist her. But she soon finds that she is a stranger in the neighborhood, who visits the farm and professes to be investigating the history of old country families.

But Jill thought she had pressed Mark by the gracious use of his Christian name, she was mistaken. Mark had seen too much on the previous evening for that. His temporary elation subsided as soon as he had left her and his mind had turned again to the auction that he became again the victim of gloomy foreboding.

Meanwhile Philip Barbour had found his promised wife. He had paid her helping with the elder-making where she made an attractive picture as she moved among the more somberly clad workers. Her clear-colored shirt was the only splash of color on this grey November day.

She ceased work when he entered the farmyard and went to meet him, holding out a hand which was damp and fragrant with apple juice.

"Excuse my hand," she said laughingly. "But they had chafed before the pig-logs fire, and Jill had offered him the usual hospitality of the countryside in the form of a glass of home-made wine. Now on this occasion, she took him up to a room which she had used as a kind of study, for old Jasper Merrifield had spent a great deal of time in reading and writing behind the old oak door which Barbour was now admiring.

Presently she produced the piece of leather bearing the coat-of-arms, and gave it to him to examine.

"Most interesting," he said. "I have seen many, but never one like this." Whereupon he redrew out a number of technical details concerning it. Then he added, "But I am sorry you will have to take a few notes of it, and then I will let you know all about it. I hope you will permit me to call again."

Jill could not refuse, even had she wished. Further, she was rather relieved that he had not asked her to marry him, as she had feared.

"Of course," she said. "And now perhaps you would like to look round my farm?"

Barbour expressed delight at the idea, and soon the pair were wandering down the long drive of the farm, which was a wide cleft of the country. There were many winks and nods among the workers in the farmyard, and old George, the head man, was looking on with interest.

"The auction at Denbridge was as picturesque as any to be found. One entering it through the great coach-house, a half-timbered hostelry in the main street. One found oneself in a wide cobble-paved square, divided by a row of houses, and a number of square-towered towers in each of which were 'lots' of various animals awaiting the time when the busy auctioneer, in his grey bowler hat should ask for bids. Mr. Billmore was a character at the auction and his jokes made many a rustic side ache with laughter. The wide blue sky was a sight which few farmers and butchers could resist the sides of the animals with their sides, the butchers knowing almost to a pound the equivalent in beef, pork and mutton of the cows, pigs and sheep.

Mark first entered the cozy bar of the hotel where, on his visits to Denbridge, he was sure of finding a friend. On this day he was not disappointed, though it would have been better for his peace of mind had he not come in, for the greeting accorded him was tinged with half-expressed laughter.

"Tell me you've got a rival, Master Hunkle," quipped an old farmer near the fire.

Mark looked puzzled. "Rival? What do you mean?" he asked, though the sudden suspicion of the truth had flashed into his mind.

"Tell him, Joe," said the old farmer to another.

"There's one like this, Mark," said the other. "There's been a fine, good-looking fellow in Denbridge, and he's been asking the missus here quite a lot of questions about that young woman of yours at Stone Town."

"Really?" exclaimed Mark with feigned nonchalance. "Well, I wish him luck."

Mark was accustomed to being chaffed about Jill, and in truth, rather liked it, for Jill was remarkably popular among the farmers and he took a mild pride in proprietorship in her when she was mentioned in his presence, though not on this occasion.

"What sort of questions?"

"Oh, about Miss Merrifield and the farm, and who was looking after poor old Jasper's affairs in a lawyer kind of way. Better watch your step, young man, for he was an uncommon good-looking fellow. Stayed here a night or two, so they told me."

"He's staying here now?" asked Mark, thinking that so much indifference might cause suspicion. The answer he received was negative.

"No, they say he's gone to Stone Town. He'll be back."

Mark affected amusement, and presently left the company to join the farmer he had told the truth; indeed a little more than he imagined, for at the moment, Philip Barbour was actually on his way to Stone Town. Barbour would probably have been annoyed had he overheard the conversation, for he had asked his questions of the landlady in a confidential manner. But, although he knew a great deal, he understood very little about the vicinity of country.
