AMY JOHNSON... "Fear is a curious subject. There have been other times when I have been badly frightened, but I think now that fear disappears with experience. Of course, such incidents as that of the Taurus would scare the stoutest and most experienced of fliers. Such things can never be prevented, and there is no way of getting through them but luck. They seem to happen without an instant's warning, and usually they seem to pass quite quickly. I shall always be soared when they happen to me—and by 'scared' I mean thoroughly frightened. For me the sudden, unexpected type of danger will always have the staid, sheer physical fear in it."

Portrait of Kenneth Grahame

It was a mixed and versatile group of men that gathered around William Ernest Henley, in London, in the early nineties. Diverse in temper, apt and achievement, Henley was the core that bound them together—be, and the fact that all were writing, more or less, for the Scots Observer and the National Observer.

Among these leisure-hour gentle men of the pen was a tall, well-built, blonde man, who moved slowly and with dignity, and who preserved, amid the violent emotions of the group, a calm, comprehending demeanor accompanied by a ready wit that women would call "sweet."

There were so many men in this group, so many strangers were continually coming and going, that it was a time of confusion. "What is this?" asked a questioner to my neighbor at one of the meetings. "This is the life of a writer," my neighbor replied, "Kenneth Grahame. He wrote that jolly thing about children called 'The BFG'."

He has one other theme, that of escape; escape from prose and poetry; escape from the pros of 'The BFG' Street, where the Bank of England is located, to poetry of the trackless meadows—To Centaurs or trolls, to the state of a p. on's health since the method was known to the ancients.
