WEEDS

(Experimental Farms Note)

Insect pests together with weeds are recognized enemies of the farmer and the latter probably cause as much or even more loss than the former. One reason for this is that insect damage is usually more noticeable and more complete, and it usually becomes absoluteley necessary for the farmer to fight such an enemy or no crop will be harvested. Then too, insect pests usually are confined to a single crop and these lend themselves more readily to treatment. Weeds, on the other hand, are found in practically all crops and the loss of crop not being so complete as in the case of insect pests, less time is expended in combating this menace.

Weeds are usually handy, difficult to kill, and are gross feeders. As with other plants, their food can only be taken up when in solution. Their gross feeding habits, therefore, account for an enormous loss of soil moisture, that otherwise might go toward the production of profitable crops?

Contrary to general belief the eradication of most weeds does not add very greatly to the regular farm work, in fact, in the long run it may be said that the reverse is true, for freedom from weeds greatly facilitates not only seed bed preparation, but many other farm operations as well.

It has been said that "good cultivation will destroy weeds." This statement is correct in part only. More correctly it might be said that "good cultivation at the proper time will destroy weeds."

A striking demonstration of this was smade at the Dominion Experimental Station, Charlottetown, several years ago, when two pieces of land, heavily infested with couch grass, were ploughed at the same time. One plot was thoroughly top-worked during a hot dry spell, the roots of the couch being well brought up to the surface. The couch was practically all killed by the treatment and in the spring very little labour was required to prepare an excellent seed-bed.

On the other plot top-working was delayed for a period of about ten days. In the meantime several heavy rains had occurred. Top-working at that time was found to be quite ineffective and it was found almost impossible to kill any of this weed. In the following spring it was found that practically all the couch had survived and it was difficult to prepare a satisfactory seed-bed.

Top-working to be efficient must be done at the proper time, and so employed is a satisfactory control for many weeds.

Ex-convict: "Yes, mum, that's how they got me."
