Air Routes Must Be Held

Declares Toronto Daily—Atlantic Tendencies

"Freedom of the air," advocated by Great Britain and France just after the war, seems to be becoming little more than empty phrase. The Toronto Daily and Empire in this editorial:

"Aviation, unaided of the lesson to be drawn from sea experience, is turning more and more toward nationalism. Closing of national airways already has brought serious difficulties in the way of the development of the air routes, notably on the India route. Conditions imposed by Persia have made necessary important changes in organization. Italy, too, has interposed obstacles, which have resulted in the revising of the air routes to Cairo.

Up to the present, Britain has not laid down obstructive regulations, and Italy retains permission to use post-offices in several parts of the Empire, while French and Dutch lines continue to operate across India.

With the possibility that the developing of air routes will become, in some parts of the world, at least, a matter of little nationalistic bargaining, it is manifest that close attention must be given to the "blaming of trails"—especially those of the Imperial Atlantic passenger.

The exploratory flight of Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Lindbergh is significant in many respects. Leaving North Haven, Maine, on July 16, Lindbergh, way of Halifax, and his wife proceeded to Labrador and Greenland, and then to Scandinavia, and on to the Gulf of Finland. Visiting Moscow, he returned to England, where Mrs. Lindbergh has visited her invalid sister.

On the departure of the Lindberghs, unofficial statements indicated that their purpose was to study the possibilities of the Greenland route between the two northern lines deemed most favorable. A report being prepared by Colonel Lindbergh undoubtedly will convey important data regarding the northern lands he visited and the facilities they offer in the development of air routes and airports.

The North Atlantic is the shortest but most difficult of the Empire routes. Service over it is expected to develop by stages, and a conference attended by British, United States and Canadian representatives, which was the scene of a conference at London, is expected to become the keystone of the route.

Under license from the Danish Government, Pan-American Airways holds exclusive rights to carry commercial service across Greenland.

As the London Times has pointed out, "the example set by certain companies at other ports on the Atlantic routes is presumably one which Newfoundland will be unable to ignore."

It is clear that the safeguarding of British flying interests will be the energy and chief factor in the part of the best Empire experts. The future of Newfoundland, as a strategic point, presents an especially interesting problem. Whether or not development there will take the form of an oceanic airport in which several nations will be interested presents a question demanding an early decision.

Similar problems attach to the Azores route, which it will be remembered, was chosen by General Balbo and his return to Italy at the moment for his return trip to Rome. It is a secret chamber, the entrance to which is guarded by the British, but Britain here also possesses a strategic point of first importance in Bermuda.

For the rights to fly over the Atlantic becomes necessary, it is certain that the reservation of rights on the British island will become an important factor in the situation. Happily, however, a joint arrangement with the United States regarding the Bermuda-Azores route promises to work out satisfactorily.

Fresh evidence of the importance of the Lindbergh quest is to be seen in the current discussion of its possible relationship to the future development of the Arctic coastline. Since large-scale mining development in Siberia has been predicted, as well as

The Fall Fair

The remarkable attendance of 9,000 persons at the Burford Fair has led the Woodstock Sentinel-Review to comment on the significance of the local exhibitions and their value to the community.

The Motor transport has undoubtedly contributed to the extension of the sphere of influence of the fall fairs. Exhibits are brought from considerable distances. Cattle, horses and other live stock were brought from as far as the vicinity of London and Toronto to Burford to compete with the local products. Thus the competition was keen. It is said that many of the exhibitors at Toronto and London, Western Fair in London.

Perhaps it is better to compare the fair to the fair in London. The object of these fairs is to provide competition as it is likely to improve the quality of the exhibits. The object of these fairs is to provide competition as it is likely to improve the quality of the exhibits.
