

Jill of the Fields

A ROMANCE
By Kennaway James

Mark and eventually found himself on the other side of Maggie Spence's farm, where in the field of winter wheat, a sinister little group of police and others stood round the murdered man.

From a distance came the sound of a hunting horn, for it was a good day for the hunt. And as he listened, he turned back to the night when, from that very spinney, he had heard the three sharp barks of a fox. Then he remembered the old belief that three fox-barks mean three dead men. As his eyes again travelled to the field of winter wheat, "But why, then, there's one of them," he mused.

From speculation about the identity of the dead man, Mark's mind, at a time, turned again to Jill and to their conversation which had been interrupted so dramatically by the farmer. "Please do as I ask. Send for the police. You have only to telephone. I will come and do it if you like." They had reached the gate leading into the yard, and had paused.

"Yes, we shall have to send for them," "I shall have to tell them about the burglar," "But you go back. I shall be right."

Mark looked closely at Jill as she spoke, but she avoided his eyes. He saw a faint smile on her face, but it was not the smile of the morning's events, but a smile that was more of a secret. He felt that there were even more important things to follow.

But there came again to her the feeling that in some way she was being deceived. She prayed inwardly that it should not be, and decided to discuss the matter with the police. She called at the farm that day, as he was sure to do.

Mark went back to where Larry and Jill were standing. He saw the police officers and the man with the large handkerchief. He saw the man who was standing there, and he saw the man who was standing there.

"Go and bring a tarpaulin," he ordered.

The importance of his mission cheered up Larry considerably and he set off to the farm with alacrity, what time Jill telephoned to the police.

THE WHEATFIELD CRIME

If any man could be called a typical village policeman that man was Sergeant Bullock. Rubicund of face, and with upturned moustaches, he was allowed the body to be moved. An improvised stretcher had been made of a hurdle, and the body from where it lay.

Suddenly, there was an exclamation from the man who was watching the grim work, for beneath the body lay a round metal box.

The Prince of Wales and a Yorkshireman

A few days ago, visiting unemployed centres in Yorkshire, the Prince of Wales came to the town of Barnsley, famous as the home of Barnsley colliers and Herbert Smith, president of the Miners' Federation and was "Ahr Erb" to a million miners. It was a case of the Prince of Wales coming to the town of Barnsley before he was ten. His childhood was spent in his home, the Prince of Wales, in the town of Barnsley.

Girl Wins Dental Award

For the first time the most coveted award of the London School of Dental Surgery has been won by a girl. It is Miss E. L. B. Stamp, of Wiltshire, England, and the award is the Stampers Scholarship, the holder of which is regarded as the senior student in the final year of the course. Miss Stamp also took prizes in dental hygiene, bacteriology, and dental diseases in children, and a certificate of honor in radiology. The school will not admit women students.
