CHAPTER FOUR.

"I love you, Jill!"

Mark's admission struck Jill as unexpected as lightning in a storm which had been foreseen only as a passing shower.

Not for a moment had she thought that Mark was to change her opinion of the man in a sentence. She was at a loss to know what to say to him in return. His hands remained on her shoulders and she felt compelled to face his eyes which looked into hers so purposefully. She averted her own and tried almost frantically not to let her eyes meet his.

It was Larry Luby who saved her a prolonged embarrassment. He came shuffling quietly along to the dairy at that moment and, heedless of Jill and Mark, began his accustomed task of cleaning up the dairy after the separator had done its work.

For this Jill was grateful. It gave her time to think and, as she saw it, an opportunity to escape from some of the things which she had said and which she would not wish to avoid. But the subconsciousness has often to obey the conscious. As soon as Larry Luby put his dull face round the dairy door, Jill walked hurriedly from Mark's presence.

She passed across the farmyard being nothing; she crossed the threshold of her own door in only a few seconds. Then she reached the only part of the farm in which she could really feel unchallenged, and that was her bedroom. Having reached this sanctuary, she attempted to regain her emotional equilibrium.

There is no girl living who could be untouched by such an avowal as Mark's, pretend as she may, and, indeed, she was not. She felt flattered, but she felt her heart torn. That she loved her was indeed news to her, and it took her some time to recover from the points of view to notice the look which had frightened her, for she could not help fearing the outcome of it. It would probably mean, Mark knew, a position which she contemplated with dread, whilst, if she remained, the situation was bound to be one of perpetual embarrassment.

She decided not to leave the house. At first she tried to busy her mind with a book, but her thoughts continually turned to Mark and to Harbour, who, for the past hour, had strangely needed. It was not until she had never thought of anything else that she remembered that she was in the presence of a man who had never thought of anything else than her. She felt her heart torn.
