

Jill of the Fields

A ROMANCE
By Kennaway James

Mathewson, Jill Morrison became, on the death of her father, owner of a farm near Stone Town, which she had inherited from her mother. She was a beautiful girl, with eyes like the sea, and a smile that was a revelation to those who had known her in her childhood. She was a girl who understood her own mind, and she was a girl who understood the heart of a man.

Once outside, Mark let his rage have its head. He cursed loudly as he strode back to his cottage.

He had purposely called Jill by her Christian name. He would have been glad to have done so on any other day. But on this day it was a insult. It was a challenge. It was a declaration of war.

Barbour stepped forward and sat on the arm of her chair. He looked at her with a steady gaze. He was a man who had seen many things, and he was a man who had learned many lessons.

"You had better go now," she said with a touch of her old dignity. "I'm going to bed. I'm going to rest. I'm going to think of you."

"The Morrises are a great and distinguished family," he said, "and it is a fine thing for you to represent it in these equalitarian days."

"Ah! Stone Town! What a history!" he had risen to examine a monogram engraved on the old stone mantel-piece. Jill had automatically risen with him.

Stone Town, on the night of Jill's visit from Mark and Barbour, was wrapped in November fog. The air was thick with the mist of a winter night.
