Jill of the Fields A ROMANCE By Kennaway James

Mark entered Jill in the farmyard, and although they spoke of matters and of the incident in which Jill had already heard from one of the men of old George's encounter with the inspector.

"I'll get with that flashy fellow before I've done, if the police don't let me," he said to himself. "I wish that old devil George would let me know what's in his mind. He knows something."

London Considers Plans For Central Airport
The Corporation of London has unanimously decided to consider the erection of an airport or landing-station, F. A. Horner, who brought the matter forward, declared that in a year or two any city or town with a landing-stage or aircraft port will be like a city or town without a railway station.

When the other inspector, whose name was Bain, got to Denbridge and found Barbour had gone back to London, he informed Scotland Yard and gave a description of him. He also gave to the man at the other end of the telephone the story of the extraordinary case on which he was working.

feeling that she had some justification only needed to aggravate matters. His thoughts were interrupted by Inspector Norton who came up to him and the face of one who seeks a friend in the hour of need.

"Very well," said Norton conclusively, "I shall go and have a word with him myself. I believe he is visiting Miss Merridew just now."

CHAPTER VIII.
When Phillip Barbour heard that the inspector wished to see him, he hastened to reassure Jill, whose concern was palpable in her frightened questioning expression.

"It's quite all right," he said, confidently. "You see, I am comparatively well, and I shall be able to question naturally that they should wish to question me."

At a conference which was held in Washington in 1884 and at which twenty-five countries were represented, it was decided to adopt the present method of reckoning longitude east and west from the meridian of Greenwich.

When the other inspector, whose name was Bain, got to Denbridge and found Barbour had gone back to London, he informed Scotland Yard and gave a description of him.

From the crime writer's point of view, there was ever such a perfect murder? Everything was there, the old grey farm, the novelty of the scene, the romantic figure of Jill in the background and the entertaining rural characters on the farm.

At the Geophysical Observatory of Tashkent, Uzbekistan, the Soviet scientists have set up a boiler which is heated by the sun's rays. So far as we can determine from the meagre description that has reached this country, the apparatus serves the purpose of heating water for laundries and for outdoor bathtubs.

Great Heat From the Sun
Crude as it is, the Soviet solar boiler indicates that the hope of utilizing the sun's energy will not die. The reason is to be found in the astounding amount of heat that beats upon the earth from the sun.
