Health of Pioncers

In the early days of settlement in Ganada there was little sickness among the pioneers. This was due largely to the fact that their work kept them outdoors in the fresh air and that they received plenty of healthful exercise. Swinging an axe in the bush, clearing the land for cultivation, and the hundred and one odd jobs that go in the hewing of a homestead out of virgin forest, were tasks that built muscle, kept a man in first-class physical condition, and the new man in first-class physical condition, and the world be pulled up or down like a window blind to cover the ears as outdoor, and the world be pulled up or down like a window blind to cover the ears as outdoor, and the world be pulled up or down like a window blind to cover the ears as outdoor, and the side of the world be pulled up or down like a window blind to cover the ears as outdoor, and the some little gadget in a hat which could be pulled up or down like a window blind to cover the ears as outdoor, and the world be outdoor, and the world be some little gadget in a hat which could be made to the wind blows heavy from the west and north. the construction of its huge industrial enterprises, the Soviet's have pushed on the building of a second track along the longest railway in the world—4,500-mile trans-Siberian railway, which is of major strategical importance in the military defence of Russia in the Far East. In two years the Soviet's have practically completed the double tracking of this line over a distance of 1,300 miles—from huge Lake Baikal to Khabarovsk, the Soviet's Far-Eastern military centre. Work in this section is in its final stages, and normal freight and passenger traffic is expected to begin as second track along the formula for the contraction of the suburbs, are the survivors of the suburbs, are the suburbs, one of the suburbs, are the survivors of the great Chines; migration in the gold rush days.
