The fans were loyal and came back The fans were loyal and came back year after year at the beginning of the season expecting Pop to produce a winning team or at least a team which would give them the thrill and excitement they expected. Sports writers suggested that there was a jinx on Pop and the fans believed it.

Pop knew all the tricks of the game and invented some new ones, but he had not been able to crash through. Pop had never been kknown to say "enough" and even when he was licked he didn't know it.

Pop knew what the loyalty of the fans meant. He was one of the last of the old-timers who knew baseall and baseball audiences. He was a canny manager and a keen judge of human nature. Ten years before, his Fire-eaters were the talk of the nation and were winning everything in sight. Pop realized that the fans were growing a little tired of the invincible team which wore his colors. It was at that time that he made his greatest mistake in all his years of baseball management. He disbanded the famous Blue Fire-eaters, scattered them to the wind and the greed of other managers. Pop thought he could build up another team just as good if not better than the Fire-Eaters. He tried, tried hard, but he had lost his magic touch and miracle refused to happen. He bought and traded good men, gave
