farmers can counter rising cost of living so as to prevent undue rises in the cost of milk. The best dairy farmers are trying to use this way and those who do are making a good living. They strive to improve the quality of their herds and are continously seeking cows that give larger production.

New Zealand stands high in the dairy world because dairy farmers there have utilized the best of science and machinery, and have been careful about seed and stock selection and the use of fertilizer. Before the war there were 700,000 cows with an annual average yield of 140 pounds of butterfat per cow. Now there are two million cows with an average yield of 220 pounds. This spectacular increase has been achieved without a proportionate increase in farm labour costs.

There is obviously a great difference in cost per quart of milk for a productive animals. The productive animals are productive animals. The productive animals.
