THE FARM HOME, ITS SURROUNDINGS

Houtel (Bridal Wreath); Forsythia Fortune (Golden Bell); Hydrangea panicle (Philadelphia coronata (Mock Orange); Syringa (Lilac).

The second entrance is the doorway itself, and it is very important that a fitting framework be provided. This is the one point toward which all owners of trees should approach, hundreds of times a year. Why should it be left unattractive when a simple planting will completely alter its appearance?

Again the easiest form of planting would be a single flowering shrub or evergreen on either side of the doorway, and it is essential that the same variety be used, as this provides balance or harmony. Building on this initial planting arrangement may be increased to two groups of three, and this usually gives the best average entrance.

Among the many fine varieties which may be used are Deutzia, Pride of Rochester, Spiraea Van Houttei and Anthony Waterer; Hydrangea, paniculata grandiflora; Hibiscus (Rose Shrub); Forsythia Fortune (Japanese Barbary); Sambucus foliosa aurea (Golden Elder); Weigelia; Camellia (Snowball); Symplocarpus (Snow Berry).

Turning to the house itself, if it is in close to one side of the doorway and a proportional distance back from the highway, it will permit a large amount of planting in the front, with open vistas and pleasing views from the main entrance to the rear. This may be massed in front of trees on one side to secure the desired effect, leaving an open expanse more or less unbroken by individual shrubs or beds.

A few trees behind the house will effectively screen out buildings, and form a setting for the home, so that it appears as framed from the highway. Beautification consists largely in blocking out objectionable or unsightly objects and this often applies to a garage, barn, poultry house etc.

Grouping and massing of shrubs is desirable. Rarely ever is a shrub planted alone. Grouping is the common practice of nurserymen, and wish the planted home to appear natural. Strive to group the planting so that irregular lines are important. A cluster of tall shrubs may be jointed to a second group by some of lesser height. There are several well defined places where shrubs and ornamental plants should be located to produce a pleasing effect:

(1) Grouping or massing along borders.

(2) Grouping near the corners of curves in paths or roads.

(3) Clusters in the angle of two walks or roads (4) Planting along the foundations. (5) A heavy planting in a corner.

The perennial garden, with suitable bulbs and annuals, may be placed near the house to be visible from veranda and windows. The garden usually gives pleasing results when following the course of the drive.

In this case the object is color and brightening of the scene. It is suggested that those wishing more detailed information should consult the local Agricultural Representative or the Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph.

(Editor's Note: Next week, Mr. M. B. Davis of Ottawa will discuss the making and care of the farm lawn.)
