

Orange Pekoe Blend "GALAHAD" TEA

THE GROOM WAS SHY

By ALMA SIOUX SCARBERRY

CHAPTER IX

When Lisa and Mariborh rounded the corner of the street where Tucky's uncle lived, the first sight that greeted their eyes was Mike Tully's car, parked in the driveway.

Lisa bit her lip. Mariborh slowed up. "Why, look!" He pointed. "It must be Mike who has a date with Tucky this evening."

"Step on it!" Lisa told him savagely. "Don't let them see us. I mean I wouldn't want them to think we're spying on them."

Mariborh obeyed automatically. "Look!" he said stupidly. "What do you know about that?"

Lisa made a supreme effort to smile and look totally unperturbed. "I don't care one little bit!" She snuggled closer to him. "I'd rather be out with you, Mariborh. Honest I would."

"Ah, now!" The Jones heir was blushing to the roots of his hair. "That's stuff, Honey-chick."

Drop the Southern Air "Don't go using your new Southern dialect on me now," Lisa warned. "Because I'm sick and tired of it. It sounds so silly."

Mariborh scarcely knew how to answer that. So he changed the subject. "I thought you said Tucky was going out with Judy's doctor."

"Well, I did think so," Tucky gibed with ease. "I know she wanted to badly enough."

"I guess at the girls will be rushing him around," Mariborh offered. "He's pretty keen stuff."

"Two Old Few Judy," Lisa took out her lipstick and proceeded to add another layer to her carmen lips.

Mariborh watched her with disapproval. "I think you look better without too much of that junk."

"Really, don't you think it's more attractive?" "No," Mariborh stuck to his guns. "I don't like it. It's too unnatural. Judy never uses anything like that, and she always looks so nice and clean."

"Well," Lisa was amused but not so very pleased. "If you don't want me to, Mariborh, I won't use so much."

"Oh, yes," Lisa laughed softly. "It's a good thing I don't have to account to anybody but Gram. My father would just have a fit if he knew I'd been out all night."

"Did you like it?" Peter bent over her. "Oh, yes," Judy stifled a happy yawn. "I had the best time I've ever had in my life."

"Good," Peter bent closer. "Judy," he said then, "you're the loveliest girl I've ever met in my life."

"She dropped her eyes, and her heart began to pitter-pat. "You—don't mean it," she told him in a small voice.

"But I do," he said before, of course, but I've never been so sincere. You're so little and good—and dear."

His lips were almost on her cheek and she felt she should move away, but something held her against her will.

"Judy," Peter said then, "have you ever been kissed?" "Oh, no," she denied.

"I'm glad," Peter suddenly put his arms around her and before she could turn, his lips were on hers.

"I—yes," Judy tried to push him away. But Peter would not let her go.

"Judy," he said softly, and his lips were tender, but sweet as a new wine.

Judy's cheeks flamed with color, and she wanted very much to be angry. But she just couldn't quite manage it. His arms were still around her.

"A Kiss Observed "Don't be angry with me, little Judy," Peter begged. "Tell me you forgive me."

"I—guess so," Judy pushed him away gently. "But you must not let it happen again."

"Oh, but I can't promise," Peter laughed softly, happily. "It may happen thousands and thousands of times, Who knows?"

"But I—mustn't!" Judy put her hand on the car door. "Good night, Peter."

She was in the house, leaning breathlessly against her door before she realized the car had gone, and that some of the neighbors might have seen her being made love to in a car. Two people had. Her grandmother and Mariborh. She shivered with pleased excitement. Judy had actually let Peter kiss her.

But Mariborh, who hadn't really meant to spy from his bedroom window, was filled with a sudden desire to go down and strangle the good-looking Dr. Jones.

Well, Mariborh decided angrily, he'd certainly do one thing about it. Give Judy a darn good talking to. Since her father was away, come man would have to protect her. And Mariborh felt it was his Christian duty.

(To Be Continued)

Judy had learned to dance in the gym at school. And although she had had no practice socially, she was not afraid to try when the time came. Mariborh thanked his stars that the traitorous Tucky had given him some lessons.

Peter bowed to several acquaintances in the club, but gave his whole attention to Judy. Even if he hadn't remembered that Gram had asked him to, he would have anyway. She was refreshing as a spring breeze, he decided, contrasting her with the girls that surrounded them.

She had worn the yellow dress again and he found her entirely lovely and desirable. From the sparkle in her eyes he knew she was happy and after a time seemed to throw off her self-consciousness with childish simplicity.

"You're sweet, little Judy," he told her against her hair as they danced, and she said nothing but sighed happily. He had to bend to touch the top of her little black head.

Mariborh said once as he danced with Lisa, "Say, don't you think the doctor acts as if he's falling for Judy?"

Lisa laughed airily. "Oh, Mariborh! It's his way. He's just a lady-killer. He wouldn't fall for a little country girl like Judy."

"What's the matter with her?" Mariborh asked defensively. "She's a swell kid."

"She's all right," Lisa soothed. "But just because a man takes her out a couple of times doesn't mean he'll fall in love with her."

"I should think he would," Mariborh watched his neighbor with a new interest. "Any man would if he had a sense. Judy would certainly make a wonderful wife for a doctor or some big professional man."

The Best Time Ever Lisa dropped her matter, and decided they'd better go back to the table for awhile. There was nothing in the world that irked the red-headed queen of Teabrook quite so much as to have a man who was with show interest in any one but herself.

It was five o'clock when Judy and Peter stopped in front of the Miller house.

"Oh, dear me!" Judy laughed softly. "It's a good thing I don't have to account to anybody but Gram. My father would just have a fit if he knew I'd been out all night."

"Did you like it?" Peter bent over her. "Oh, yes," Judy stifled a happy yawn. "I had the best time I've ever had in my life."

"Good," Peter bent closer. "Judy," he said then, "you're the loveliest girl I've ever met in my life."

"She dropped her eyes, and her heart began to pitter-pat. "You—don't mean it," she told him in a small voice.

"But I do," he said before, of course, but I've never been so sincere. You're so little and good—and dear."

His lips were almost on her cheek and she felt she should move away, but something held her against her will.

"Judy," Peter said then, "have you ever been kissed?" "Oh, no," she denied.

"I'm glad," Peter suddenly put his arms around her and before she could turn, his lips were on hers.

"I—yes," Judy tried to push him away. But Peter would not let her go.

"Judy," he said softly, and his lips were tender, but sweet as a new wine.

Judy's cheeks flamed with color, and she wanted very much to be angry. But she just couldn't quite manage it. His arms were still around her.

"A Kiss Observed "Don't be angry with me, little Judy," Peter begged. "Tell me you forgive me."

"I—guess so," Judy pushed him away gently. "But you must not let it happen again."

"Oh, but I can't promise," Peter laughed softly, happily. "It may happen thousands and thousands of times, Who knows?"

"But I—mustn't!" Judy put her hand on the car door. "Good night, Peter."

She was in the house, leaning breathlessly against her door before she realized the car had gone, and that some of the neighbors might have seen her being made love to in a car. Two people had. Her grandmother and Mariborh. She shivered with pleased excitement. Judy had actually let Peter kiss her.

But Mariborh, who hadn't really meant to spy from his bedroom window, was filled with a sudden desire to go down and strangle the good-looking Dr. Jones.

Well, Mariborh decided angrily, he'd certainly do one thing about it. Give Judy a darn good talking to. Since her father was away, come man would have to protect her. And Mariborh felt it was his Christian duty.

(To Be Continued)

Judy had learned to dance in the gym at school. And although she had had no practice socially, she was not afraid to try when the time came. Mariborh thanked his stars that the traitorous Tucky had given him some lessons.

Peter bowed to several acquaintances in the club, but gave his whole attention to Judy. Even if he hadn't remembered that Gram had asked him to, he would have anyway. She was refreshing as a spring breeze, he decided, contrasting her with the girls that surrounded them.

She had worn the yellow dress again and he found her entirely lovely and desirable. From the sparkle in her eyes he knew she was happy and after a time seemed to throw off her self-consciousness with childish simplicity.

"You're sweet, little Judy," he told her against her hair as they danced, and she said nothing but sighed happily. He had to bend to touch the top of her little black head.

Mariborh said once as he danced with Lisa, "Say, don't you think the doctor acts as if he's falling for Judy?"

Lisa laughed airily. "Oh, Mariborh! It's his way. He's just a lady-killer. He wouldn't fall for a little country girl like Judy."

"What's the matter with her?" Mariborh asked defensively. "She's a swell kid."

"She's all right," Lisa soothed. "But just because a man takes her out a couple of times doesn't mean he'll fall in love with her."

"I should think he would," Mariborh watched his neighbor with a new interest. "Any man would if he had a sense. Judy would certainly make a wonderful wife for a doctor or some big professional man."

The Best Time Ever Lisa dropped her matter, and decided they'd better go back to the table for awhile. There was nothing in the world that irked the red-headed queen of Teabrook quite so much as to have a man who was with show interest in any one but herself.

It was five o'clock when Judy and Peter stopped in front of the Miller house.

"Oh, dear me!" Judy laughed softly. "It's a good thing I don't have to account to anybody but Gram. My father would just have a fit if he knew I'd been out all night."

"Did you like it?" Peter bent over her. "Oh, yes," Judy stifled a happy yawn. "I had the best time I've ever had in my life."

"Good," Peter bent closer. "Judy," he said then, "you're the loveliest girl I've ever met in my life."

"She dropped her eyes, and her heart began to pitter-pat. "You—don't mean it," she told him in a small voice.

"But I do," he said before, of course, but I've never been so sincere. You're so little and good—and dear."

His lips were almost on her cheek and she felt she should move away, but something held her against her will.

"Judy," Peter said then, "have you ever been kissed?" "Oh, no," she denied.

"I'm glad," Peter suddenly put his arms around her and before she could turn, his lips were on hers.

"A Kiss Observed "Don't be angry with me, little Judy," Peter begged. "Tell me you forgive me."

"I—guess so," Judy pushed him away gently. "But you must not let it happen again."

"Oh, but I can't promise," Peter laughed softly, happily. "It may happen thousands and thousands of times, Who knows?"

"But I—mustn't!" Judy put her hand on the car door. "Good night, Peter."

She was in the house, leaning breathlessly against her door before she realized the car had gone, and that some of the neighbors might have seen her being made love to in a car. Two people had. Her grandmother and Mariborh. She shivered with pleased excitement. Judy had actually let Peter kiss her.

But Mariborh, who hadn't really meant to spy from his bedroom window, was filled with a sudden desire to go down and strangle the good-looking Dr. Jones.

Well, Mariborh decided angrily, he'd certainly do one thing about it. Give Judy a darn good talking to. Since her father was away, come man would have to protect her. And Mariborh felt it was his Christian duty.

(To Be Continued)

Judy had learned to dance in the gym at school. And although she had had no practice socially, she was not afraid to try when the time came. Mariborh thanked his stars that the traitorous Tucky had given him some lessons.

Peter bowed to several acquaintances in the club, but gave his whole attention to Judy. Even if he hadn't remembered that Gram had asked him to, he would have anyway. She was refreshing as a spring breeze, he decided, contrasting her with the girls that surrounded them.

She had worn the yellow dress again and he found her entirely lovely and desirable. From the sparkle in her eyes he knew she was happy and after a time seemed to throw off her self-consciousness with childish simplicity.

"You're sweet, little Judy," he told her against her hair as they danced, and she said nothing but sighed happily. He had to bend to touch the top of her little black head.

Mariborh said once as he danced with Lisa, "Say, don't you think the doctor acts as if he's falling for Judy?"

Lisa laughed airily. "Oh, Mariborh! It's his way. He's just a lady-killer. He wouldn't fall for a little country girl like Judy."

"What's the matter with her?" Mariborh asked defensively. "She's a swell kid."

"She's all right," Lisa soothed. "But just because a man takes her out a couple of times doesn't mean he'll fall in love with her."

"I should think he would," Mariborh watched his neighbor with a new interest. "Any man would if he had a sense. Judy would certainly make a wonderful wife for a doctor or some big professional man."

The Best Time Ever Lisa dropped her matter, and decided they'd better go back to the table for awhile. There was nothing in the world that irked the red-headed queen of Teabrook quite so much as to have a man who was with show interest in any one but herself.

It was five o'clock when Judy and Peter stopped in front of the Miller house.

"Oh, dear me!" Judy laughed softly. "It's a good thing I don't have to account to anybody but Gram. My father would just have a fit if he knew I'd been out all night."

"Did you like it?" Peter bent over her. "Oh, yes," Judy stifled a happy yawn. "I had the best time I've ever had in my life."

"Good," Peter bent closer. "Judy," he said then, "you're the loveliest girl I've ever met in my life."

"She dropped her eyes, and her heart began to pitter-pat. "You—don't mean it," she told him in a small voice.

"But I do," he said before, of course, but I've never been so sincere. You're so little and good—and dear."

His lips were almost on her cheek and she felt she should move away, but something held her against her will.

"Judy," Peter said then, "have you ever been kissed?" "Oh, no," she denied.

"I'm glad," Peter suddenly put his arms around her and before she could turn, his lips were on hers.

"A Kiss Observed "Don't be angry with me, little Judy," Peter begged. "Tell me you forgive me."

"I—guess so," Judy pushed him away gently. "But you must not let it happen again."

"Oh, but I can't promise," Peter laughed softly, happily. "It may happen thousands and thousands of times, Who knows?"

"But I—mustn't!" Judy put her hand on the car door. "Good night, Peter."

She was in the house, leaning breathlessly against her door before she realized the car had gone, and that some of the neighbors might have seen her being made love to in a car. Two people had. Her grandmother and Mariborh. She shivered with pleased excitement. Judy had actually let Peter kiss her.

But Mariborh, who hadn't really meant to spy from his bedroom window, was filled with a sudden desire to go down and strangle the good-looking Dr. Jones.

Well, Mariborh decided angrily, he'd certainly do one thing about it. Give Judy a darn good talking to. Since her father was away, come man would have to protect her. And Mariborh felt it was his Christian duty.

(To Be Continued)

Judy had learned to dance in the gym at school. And although she had had no practice socially, she was not afraid to try when the time came. Mariborh thanked his stars that the traitorous Tucky had given him some lessons.

Peter bowed to several acquaintances in the club, but gave his whole attention to Judy. Even if he hadn't remembered that Gram had asked him to, he would have anyway. She was refreshing as a spring breeze, he decided, contrasting her with the girls that surrounded them.

She had worn the yellow dress again and he found her entirely lovely and desirable. From the sparkle in her eyes he knew she was happy and after a time seemed to throw off her self-consciousness with childish simplicity.

"You're sweet, little Judy," he told her against her hair as they danced, and she said nothing but sighed happily. He had to bend to touch the top of her little black head.

Mariborh said once as he danced with Lisa, "Say, don't you think the doctor acts as if he's falling for Judy?"

Lisa laughed airily. "Oh, Mariborh! It's his way. He's just a lady-killer. He wouldn't fall for a little country girl like Judy."

"What's the matter with her?" Mariborh asked defensively. "She's a swell kid."

"She's all right," Lisa soothed. "But just because a man takes her out a couple of times doesn't mean he'll fall in love with her."

"I should think he would," Mariborh watched his neighbor with a new interest. "Any man would if he had a sense. Judy would certainly make a wonderful wife for a doctor or some big professional man."

The Best Time Ever Lisa dropped her matter, and decided they'd better go back to the table for awhile. There was nothing in the world that irked the red-headed queen of Teabrook quite so much as to have a man who was with show interest in any one but herself.

It was five o'clock when Judy and Peter stopped in front of the Miller house.

"Oh, dear me!" Judy laughed softly. "It's a good thing I don't have to account to anybody but Gram. My father would just have a fit if he knew I'd been out all night."

"Did you like it?" Peter bent over her. "Oh, yes," Judy stifled a happy yawn. "I had the best time I've ever had in my life."

"Good," Peter bent closer. "Judy," he said then, "you're the loveliest girl I've ever met in my life."

"She dropped her eyes, and her heart began to pitter-pat. "You—don't mean it," she told him in a small voice.

"But I do," he said before, of course, but I've never been so sincere. You're so little and good—and dear."

His lips were almost on her cheek and she felt she should move away, but something held her against her will.

"Judy," Peter said then, "have you ever been kissed?" "Oh, no," she denied.

"I'm glad," Peter suddenly put his arms around her and before she could turn, his lips were on hers.

"A Kiss Observed "Don't be angry with me, little Judy," Peter begged. "Tell me you forgive me."

"I—guess so," Judy pushed him away gently. "But you must not let it happen again."

"Oh, but I can't promise," Peter laughed softly, happily. "It may happen thousands and thousands of times, Who knows?"

"But I—mustn't!" Judy put her hand on the car door. "Good night, Peter."

She was in the house, leaning breathlessly against her door before she realized the car had gone, and that some of the neighbors might have seen her being made love to in a car. Two people had. Her grandmother and Mariborh. She shivered with pleased excitement. Judy had actually let Peter kiss her.

But Mariborh, who hadn't really meant to spy from his bedroom window, was filled with a sudden desire to go down and strangle the good-looking Dr. Jones.

Well, Mariborh decided angrily, he'd certainly do one thing about it. Give Judy a darn good talking to. Since her father was away, come man would have to protect her. And Mariborh felt it was his Christian duty.

(To Be Continued)

Judy had learned to dance in the gym at school. And although she had had no practice socially, she was not afraid to try when the time came. Mariborh thanked his stars that the traitorous Tucky had given him some lessons.

Peter bowed to several acquaintances in the club, but gave his whole attention to Judy. Even if he hadn't remembered that Gram had asked him to, he would have anyway. She was refreshing as a spring breeze, he decided, contrasting her with the girls that surrounded them.

She had worn the yellow dress again and he found her entirely lovely and desirable. From the sparkle in her eyes he knew she was happy and after a time seemed to throw off her self-consciousness with childish simplicity.

"You're sweet, little Judy," he told her against her hair as they danced, and she said nothing but sighed happily. He had to bend to touch the top of her little black head.

Mariborh said once as he danced with Lisa, "Say, don't you think the doctor acts as if he's falling for Judy?"

Lisa laughed airily. "Oh, Mariborh! It's his way. He's just a lady-killer. He wouldn't fall for a little country girl like Judy."

"What's the matter with her?" Mariborh asked defensively. "She's a swell kid."

"She's all right," Lisa soothed. "But just because a man takes her out a couple of times doesn't mean he'll fall in love with her."

"I should think he would," Mariborh watched his neighbor with a new interest. "Any man would if he had a sense. Judy would certainly make a wonderful wife for a doctor or some big professional man."

The Best Time Ever Lisa dropped her matter, and decided they'd better go back to the table for awhile. There was nothing in the world that irked the red-headed queen of Teabrook quite so much as to have a man who was with show interest in any one but herself.

It was five o'clock when Judy and Peter stopped in front of the Miller house.

"Oh, dear me!" Judy laughed softly. "It's a good thing I don't have to account to anybody but Gram. My father would just have a fit if he knew I'd been out all night."

"Did you like it?" Peter bent over her. "Oh, yes," Judy stifled a happy yawn. "I had the best time I've ever had in my life."

"Good," Peter bent closer. "Judy," he said then, "you're the loveliest girl I've ever met in my life."

"She dropped her eyes, and her heart began to pitter-pat. "You—don't mean it," she told him in a small voice.

"But I do," he said before, of course, but I've never been so sincere. You're so little and good—and dear."

His lips were almost on her cheek and she felt she should move away, but something held her against her will.

"Judy," Peter said then, "have you ever been kissed?" "Oh, no," she denied.

"I'm glad," Peter suddenly put his arms around her and before she could turn, his lips were on hers.

Gold Plate Our Gift To Royalty

Handsome Piece Featuring Map of Their Route Across Canada Will Be Presented to King George and Queen Elizabeth by Dominion as Souvenir.

Canada's souvenir gift to King George and Queen Elizabeth in connection with their month's tour of the Dominion will be a handsome piece of gold plate featuring a map of Canada with route and stopping places of Their Majesties' tour inscribed on it.

The gift will be presented to the Dominion's great gold production. It will be a masterpiece of the Canadian goldsmith's art. It will have special value as a souvenir of Their Majesties' trip from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and back again.

Presentation of the gift will be made by Premier King, possibly at Ottawa on May 29, which is being celebrated as the King's birthday, or more probably, at Halifax just before Their Majesties sail for home on June 15.

Many of our readers have too little time to spare to carry out any extended beautifying routine, so this article suggests a daily routine that even the busiest woman can fit into her schedule.

First must come a few retting-up exercises, carried out briskly. Then your hair needs vigorous brushing from the roots right to the ends.

Cleanliness is essential, so wash your face, neck, bust, and hands with gentle palmolive soap, to help cleanse, smooth and youthful your skin. And if you adopt the "six minute make-up," using Three Purpose cream, it will save your make-up problem.

You simply cannot neglect your hands; they need extra attention. Rub them at odd moments with Italian balm to help keep them smooth and white. Here is a simple after-meal, and look to your nails.

Two other little duties that add so much to feminine charm—clean your teeth morning and night, and after meals, and look to your nails.

This schedule is for a fairly normal woman and doesn't cover cases which require special treatment. You can write for my confidential advice in your personal beauty problems. Address: Detailed leaflets on the following subjects are available for 3c stamp each: Face, Eyes, Hair, Hands, Bust, Feet, Superfluous Hair, Underweight, Reducing in Spots, Slimming.

Please write direct to: Miss Barbara Lynn, 73 West Adelaide St., Room 421, Toronto, Ont.

Household Science

By SADIE B. CHAMBERS
A ROYAL DINNER
As everything everybody tends to have a "Royal" air this month, why not our menu? Now when Canadians in general are having their first opportunity to express their own loyalty and devotion to the King and Queen let us celebrate with a dinner in their honor.

I have chosen roast lamb for the meat course for in spite of the fact that we think of roast beef and of English dinners, spongy, heavy, those of you who have visited in the Motherland will remember a frequent serving of lamb. Lamb does something to me, it makes me feel like a child again, and I am sure it will find some of you search in your garden. I found some of this morning huddled away from the cold May wind so glad to be rescued. If using finger bowls drop a few petals there too, which is a very colorful and artistic scheme.

I have named the dessert "Royal Pie."

POTATO NESTS
3 cups hot mashed potatoes.
2 tablespoons butter.
3 well-beaten eggs.
Salt and pepper.
Beat together. Add 1/2 cup hot milk gradually. Add 2 tablespoons chopped chives. Beat until light fluffy. Form nests on greased baking sheet with pastry bag or shape with a spoon. Bake in a moderate oven.

NEW YORK.—So many are the attractive washable cottons made up for daytime that it is impossible to name them all. There are gingham in tailored suits; dotted Swisses in lac-frilled country frocks; volles in well-styled dresses that can easily take