No Invasion Now Of Western Front

British Government Has No Intention of Inviting Another Dunkirk

Lord Moyne said in the House of Lords recently that it would be "madness" for Britain to attempt to open a second front in the West to aid Russia and described as "folly" any more which would demand English of an army to resist invasion.

Speaking for the Government after widespread demands for a second front, Moyne said Britain lacked tanks and artillery for an attempted invasion of the continent. He said the Government, despite amateur strategists, soap box orators, and campaigns in the press, had no intention of inviting another Dunkirk.

Would Sult Hitler? "I can't imagine anything which would suit Hitler's move better than if we adopted the Chinese method of committing suicide on our enemy's doorstep," he said.

He made the Government's position clear after demands for an invasion had been made by Lord Strabolgi, who deplored the message here and the cause of Atlantic flying.

Appearing on a program on which the greatest opportunity of all time had presented itself, Britain was unable to strike in the West because of lack of equipment.

Strabolgi claimed that Germany had only 25 second-rate divisions in all of Western Europe, and that the opening of a second front would mean the loss of 100 tanks to support them. But Moyne persisted in the Government's position to aid Russia by invading the continent in a manoeuvre designed to draw German troops out of Russia.

Not Enough Equipment? Moyne implied that the opening of a second front would mean the loss of 100 tanks to support them. But Moyne persisted in the Government's position to aid Russia by invading the continent in a manoeuvre designed to draw German troops out of Russia.

Men Can Enlist Much Easier Now

Medical Requirements A Looser—Many Likely To Try Again

Being of medical requirements for recruits for Canada's active army will permit re-examination of men who have previously been rejected, interpretation of orders issued from Ottawa reveals.

Whereas formerly there was only one category of A, it is now being divided into A1 and A2. Men classified as A1 are eligible for all branches of the army with the exception of front line infantry.

The orders state that those rejected under old standards for ineffective vision, radical mastoid, or dry perforation of ear drum are encouraged to present themselves for re-examination.

Men of either A category must be able to "see to shoot or drive, undergo severe strain and have only minor, non-progressive ailments."

Applicants to make B1 category must be able to march five miles for service overseas. Those of C1 and lower can serve in Canada only.
