At South Georgia Island he observed that he almost never found the dead bodies of full-grown penguins. One day he discovered the reason. At the summit of a long hill he came upon a little transparent lake formed entirely of snow water, and around the margin stood several sickly looking penguins, silent and drooping, mingly exhausted by the long climb from the beach to the top of

"I don't know why," said he, with tragedy. I walked to the edge of the pool and looked into te translucent depth. On the cold blue bottom with their flippers outstretched, were hundreds, pos sibly thousands, of dead penguins that had made the last weary climb to reach this peaceful spot They lay face up, their breasts re-pation of planning for a better world, says the New York Times. Such planning now claims the attention of all Governments and numerous private organizations throughout the world, and especially in this country, Even Hitler is preparing to announce a new "charter" for a "new Europe," in which the small nations are to be left some identity provided they combine with the Axis in a common bulwark against Communism. Churchill's speech is the most detailed and most authoritative British pronouncement of the postwar world so far, and in its international aspects embodies, presumably, ideas which Anthony Eden is now presenting to the American Government. Mr. Churchill himself warns that such planning must not divert us from our first and foremost task of winning the war. And he likewise warns that "nothing could be more foolish at this stage than to plunge into details and try to prescribe the exact groupings of states, or lay down precise machinery for their cooperation or, still more to argue about frontiers." With these admonitions every sensible person will agree. Nothing has done more harm to the cause of the United Nations than the recent arguments about Russia's post-war frontiers.
