THE WAR . WEEK - Commentary on Current Events Rommel's Retreating Armies Travel

Between Gabes and Bizerte the gnarled trunks and dome-shaped forces moved. From the south the British Eighth Army, with its deadly train of 3,000 guns, pressed closer. In the hills to the west American and French troops workd their way through his mine fields to threaten his flank. His northern stronghold was under at-tack by the British First Army. Overhead American aircraft in 100-plane flights hammered the highways along which his desert-dusty tanks and trucks pounded, swept out to blast his base at Cag-liari and Messina across the Medi-

It would permit launching drives into Southern Europe, through France, or Italy, or the Balkans, without fear that a German force might means the man force might menace the African bases of the attacking armies. And it would open the Mediterranean to Allied shipping, which now must travel the long, 14,000-mile route around Africa to reach the Middle East and India.

The Marshal's Task The marshal's job was to stop the Allies short of these aims. It was a galling, thankless task, far different from the glorious des-tiny that seemed reserved for him nine months ago when his Afrika Korps thrust to the gates of Bgypt and the laurels of Alexander the Great were almost within his grasp. He worked hard at his undertaking, exhausted every stratagem at his command in order to carry it out. He tried first to build a stronghold stretching the length of Tunisia's east coast, linking a tough center of resistance in the Tunis-Bizerte region of the north to another based on
