Feeding More Wheat To Farm Live Stock

The feeding of wheat to live stock and poultry has exceeded the use of wheat for human consumption in Canada during four or the five years of war, and during the crop year 1943-44, animals ate twice as much wheat as did human beings, states the Quarterly Review of Coarse Grains. This conversion of wheat to live stock feeding has been a wartime development of note not only in Canada but also in the United States.

During the five years before the war, the average amount of wheat fed to live stock and poultry annually in Canada was 32,000,000 bushels against human food requirements of approximately 44,-000,000 bushels. In the crop year 1943-44 human consumption of wheat is expected to total 50,000,-000 bushels and the animal consumption more than 100,000,000 much of its strength to a peculiar natural factor.

The French ever resourceful, harnessed the mussel to help in the construction. Mussels abound on the Normandy coast, and spin what is known as byssus, or a fine silklike strand formed by the mussel into a kind of string.

The strings of all the musseis join up into a rope and form a mussel-mass so secure that not even the strongest sea can shift it. When the breakwater was being built the ingenious French engineers put thousands of mussels on loosely piled stones, knowing that the byssus would bind them together more strongly than any
