He was tucking the confession had escaped someinto his breast pocket, but the motionless figure in the window rasped on him.

'You'll be needed, too, Grant," your pardon for my treatment of you; they'll make everything right in court now — and you can have it put in the papers."

Suddenly Burleson groaned. The hideous publicity of it made him wince. He seemed to hear already the strident calls of the newsboy — "Extry!" . . .

Mark turned. There was a light in his face; he held his head high.
"Wait," he said to Fosdick; "one moment! Keep that paper. I've had fifteen years — I can afford to wait two more."

Fosdick gazed at him and Burle-

"You mean—?" gasped Fosdick.
"I mean just that!" I'll wait. I can't strike such a blow at them all nor at-" Mark stopped. He did not want to add "a dying man." Burleson rose unsteadily, facing him. "You - you know I let you suffer? And - you do this?" Mark nodded. "I'll wait." Burleson sank into his chair speechless; speechless he hid his face in his hands. Fosdick stood staring, reluctant to be convinced. "Here's a wonder!" he exclaimed at last. Pam, when she was told, saw all more clearly.

"Of course I understand! I knew you'd be like that," she said proud ly; "you're great enough to spare an old man who's wronged you! It's awfully grand, and I know it's for me. You can't stop me now, Mark Grant, for I want some of the glory; we'll face those ex-conrict years together - yes, we will!"

"The year's at the spring . . plenty of evidence why, since time immemorial, poets have written their loveliest poems in praise of spring. Autumn is beautiful tooperhaps even more so—but there is a peculiar quality that belongs only to spring . . . the miracle or dormant life awakening to new birth . . . a definite feeling of hope, of optimism, dispelling those dark, dreary clouds of defeatism that at times assailed us when days were about and gloomy. short and gloomy.

. . . I was thinking along these lines about our lovely spring when, un expectedly and with tragic sudden-ness, came word of President Roosevelt's death-and for awhile all the beauty around me seemed to vanish. Few men have enriched the world so greatly in life as did the President nor few men whose death has been mourned by so many. And yet, I believe what distresses people more than his passing is the fact that he was not spared to witness the fulfillment of that victory for which he had striven so untiringly. But no— "untiringly" is not the right word-for he must often have been tired fically would more aptly describe his devotion to duty. The wonder is not that he died when he die but that he lived so long under such a terrific strain.

And now because life must go on even though presidents die, we pay our last respects to a great and loyal leader, and then square our shoulders again and resume once more "the daily round". On Ginger Farm the daily round right now includes a little job known as seeding. The air is heavy these days with the hum of trac tors—and I think probably ours hums louder than any of the oth ers. Nothing very modest about our old "trac"—when it goes out on a job it likes to let everyone know about it. And we are also still at the wiring job—at least the electricians are. Really, we had no idea there would be so many wires. What with furnace pipes, telephone and hydro wires, there isn't much spare space in the cellar that isn't decorated in some way or another. I am wondering when the pipes will go if, and when, we put in a hot water system. The men may get through with the wiring by
