oft, diffused lighting helps obtain better likenesses in informal por-traits—portrait attachment permits close-ups.

IN TAKING informal portraits of a friend, or member of the family, it is most important to obtain a good likeness.

Usually, a better likeness is obtained if the light is soft and diffused. For informal portraits in doors, such lighting is easy to obtain. Simply use two or three amateur photo bulbs of the "flood" type, placing them so that light is cast on the subject from both sides.

These bulbs are inside-frosted, and this accounts for the softness of their light. They fit ordinary light sockets, and can be used conveniently in bridge lamps. By moving the lamps to different positions, one can bring out the shape of the subject's features so that the picture shows him at his best.

Amateur photo bulbs yield a light so brilliant that snapshots can be taken indoors at night with an inexpensive box camera. Two to three bulbs should be used, in cardboard "lampshade-type" reflectors, and Individual subject is also important, if a pleasing likeness is to be obtained. Thus, a person with prominent ears should be taken in deal of the subject, a slight tilt of the head, up or down, may be desirable. Try several shots of a person, allowing him to vary his pose each time. Compare the pictures, and the importance of this will be evident.

No expensive equipment is need for informal portraits, but a portrait attachment is helpful if you use a fixed-focus camera, or one that feet. A "diffusion" type of portrait attachment can be used for charming soft-outline close-ups, particularly of children and women. Portrait snapshots of the family should be taken often, for we all change, and new pictures keep us up to date.

With the continuance of the wintry weather Haldimand farmers are appreciating more and more the reliability of "Old Dobbin". Perhaps we might give the old boy an extra thought as to his comfort. Take one item for instance. A horse's teeth should be examined at least once a year but it is feared that often this is neglected. Yet any causes sore tongues or cheeks both of mastication and often resulting in digestive troibies. All that is required is to have a veterinal of the winter wearing.
