How War Affected Danish Agriculture

The brief picture of the agricultural situation today in Denmark, given by the Delegate from Denmark to the United Nations Food and Agriculture Conference now in session in Quebec City, is of a picture that is not as bright as it used to be. The direct physical destruction in Denmark during the years of occupation by the Nazis had been comparatively small. Until the last moment, the Nazis did not want to hit the goose that laid the golden eggs, said the Delegate, and consequently Danish agriculture had not suffered as much as agriculture in most other occupied countries.
