TREASURE OF THE SEA

By George E. Walsh

CHAPTER XVI Rose Dick took how they discovered the treasure in a wrecked schooner. Later in the day they sight what looks like land in the distance.

CHAPTER XVII Laboring under strong emotion, she walked away from him and stood by the rail, her eyes on the horizon. "I believe that is land, off there," she added, pointing. Dick merely glanced hastily over his shoulder and nodded.

"Did the crew know about the submarine and the treasure?" he asked, approaching her side.

"No, Father and I kept it to ourselves. We brought the money and gold and other things aboard in a basket, and hid them in the cabin. No one suspected we'd found anything but fresh gulf's eggs. We made five trips, and always brought eggs back with us. When we sailed away we had enough treasure aboard to make us rich—rich enough to buy another schooner and a home ashore."

She smiled at him, as if to indicate that her idea of riches was moderate, and not of the inordinate, greedy variety.

"We could have had more," she added, "if we'd taken the diamonds and rings that— But I couldn't touch them; she broke off passionately. "They were strained with blood, or at least I thought so. Father laughed at me, and said it was the salt that had tarnished them; but it made no difference. I couldn't touch them!" She drew a deep sigh, and remained silent to regain her composure. "That's why I told you," she said then, laughing gently, "that it was tainted money—blood money—and I wasn't sure I dared touch any of it. Would you?"

"I should money put to proper use is no crime," he replied simply. "You're entitled to it. You're not superstitious?"

"No—but ever since we had the money aboard disaster has followed us. First, there was the storm that wrecked the schooner; then Father's accident, and then the desertion of the crew. Next Tucu and his pirates came, and—"

"I followed next!"

"That's the only pleasant thing that's happened since we found the treasure," she replied, frankly looking him in the eyes. "Without you aboard, I think I'd have thrown that treasure overboard long before this, or given it to the sea. I'm not sure but that would have been the best way out of it."

"So, it would have been put to base uses if old Tucu got it," replied Dick. "He mustn't lay hands on it. I'm glad you deceived him. We'll get the treasure ashore, and your father can buy a new schooner with it. He'll need one after this. The Betty's pretty well battered up."

"She's insured," Rose interjected, "so we'll not need the money for that."

"Your father will need it," Dick replied. "He's made his last trip if—if he doesn't recover his mind."

An expression of pain swept across her face; then a little fiercely, with hands clenched, she said: "But he will recover, I feel it! I shan't lose hope—not if we can reach land."

"With money to pay a good doctor he'll recover," Dick replied, smiling encouragingly. "That's where your treasure will prove a blessing. It can't hoodoo you any more."

"Are you sure of that?" she interrupted, pointing to the speck on the horizon. "Isn't that the lugger again?"

Dick gave a violent start and followed her hand. The object in the distance was still too vague of outline to determine its character, but either through imagination or distorted optical illusion they thought it to be the San Miguel

One of the great improvements about present day life is that there are no old ladies any more, comments the Windsor Star. All the women look young and stylish. It used to be that when a woman reached 40, she was compelled by fashion and custom to don a shawl and a grandmother's lace bonnet and sit the rest of her life in a rocker. Now, when a woman reaches 40 she has just begun to live.

Chronicles of Ginger Farm

By Gwendoline P. Clark

Last Thursday was a day to remember even to a person used to English fogs. It was a real peeper, although not as bad as the black fogs of London. And of all days Thursday was the one on which the company that Bob works for had arranged a banquet in Toronto for its employees. All day I was worrying about what the night might bring forth and my fears were certainly not lessened when news got around of a man being killed near here on a level crossing. The poor fellow saw the light of the train but owing to the dense fog, mistook it for the light of the station.

I still another shock during the evening when our telephone rang and it was "long distance." Of course in the space of a split second I had Bob in a smash-up. The poor fellow was at least in hospital. Then the operator went on "Niagara Falls is calling." Niagara Falls that meant Second Niece. My heart stopped and my sledge hammer pounding and I was able to assure Second-Niece quite emphatically that we would just love to have her for the week-end.

How to Manage the Automobile

Editor's note: If you drive an automobile (from the front or the back) consider the following editorial by Bertram published in Mayfair Magazine. It may apply to you.

There are thousands of people driving automobiles who don't belong to the first thing about driving. If that strikes you as a half-baked, smart-pants generalization, it means because you don't know the first thing about driving.

When we look in the newspaper any Monday morning to learn who has been killed in motor accidents, we learn that even when drivers know everything else about driving, they don't know the first thing.

The first thing you must understand about your car is that it does not belong exclusively to you. Unless you get this point straight you cannot be an intelligent driver. The legal concept of ownership is already out of date as it applies to automobiles. And until every motorist gets it clearly through his mind that his car is not entirely his own property, driving will continue to threaten his purse, his health, his sanity and his life.

Conduct of Motorists

Regulations governing your conduct as a motorist will continue to be as long as you cling to your belief that your car, like your shoes, is a private and independent B. As things stand our laws are merely the expression of how much interference you deem necessary for other motorists. They are neither thought nor sincerely obeyed because you regard them as an encroachment upon your essential sovereignty as a driver. So many motorists are so many votes, and the law is timid. Every policeman's wage is a charge upon your wages, so enforcement is but a token. Short of providing a constable to ride with every driver, the law cannot cope with your intransigent attitude in supposing that your car is your very own to manage as you please.

Without thousands of other automobiles, yours would be of no use to you. You could not afford to own it. The highway, the repair stations, the bridges, the repair shops, the hot dog stands—none of the facilities upon which the very life of your car depends could exist without the support of thousands of motorists.

Control Necessary

Your car is nothing without thousands of other cars.

Our economy could not function without thousands of cars. The automobile is a social institution. It is a foundation stone of modern life. It is a public utility. Society needs the automobile as a social institution. It is a foundation stone of modern life. It is a public utility. Society needs the automobile as a social institution. Happy whimsicality colored the recent ceremony at the Tower of London to honor an American hero, says The Christian Science Monitor. High-ranking officers of the United States and British Armies and Royal Air Force were present on historic Thames-side lawns to see "G.I. Joe." That strikes you as a half-baked, smart-pants generalization, it means because you don't know the first thing about driving.
