Cow Objects Daylight Saving - - -

Julie, the Shingwauk milk cow, rejects daylight saving time. Having put it out of her life, she ignores it completely. Being a conscientious cow, she does her duty as she sees it. in her own time, in her own way. When she has given her fifty pounds of milk a day she says to herself, "That's that, the folks can drink it or give it to the pig and the calf. They can do as they like; I'm sure I will."

entire scene, resumed her regal progress to her

When her milking time was changed to six-thirty, five-thirty her time, she was unmoved. Her leisurely breakfast of young dew-sprinkled clover is now pursued without regard to ght-saving time or human convenience. When we insist upon her leaving it and head her toward the barn, her disdain says to us: "Well, if you are going to let this farm be run by city-slickers who tinker with the clock, you may, but don't expect me to suffer."

Her reproach hurts us. Particularly when we are hauling hay late in the evening, we hate to think that Julie has more sense and independence than we have regarding working time.

Julie might be described as a Herostein. She is proud of her illustrious forbears in both the Hereford and Holstein families, who gave her a Holstein body and a white Hereford face, with a black ring around each eye, which would make her look like a clown if it were not for the vast dignity and indestructible anlows she inherited from her father.

In the early part of June, Julie was milked at eight o'clock in the morning; seven her time. At precisely six-forly, her time, she emerged from the pasture and marched with measured tread, in complete serenity, towards the barn, silhouetted against the shining lake. Where the spring flows into the lake she stopped for an ample drink, lifted her nose and, after making a cool appraisal of the entire scene, resumed her regal progress to her mmediate ingerprining and discourse of affiliations in all except colitical and religious organizations. "Derogatory" information gathered in the preliminary phase will be given over to the Federal Bureau of wille, Burlington and other places. Investigation for fuller probing in have been arranged, with several cases of suspected disloyalty.
