Tractor Drivers Face Many Perils In Frozen North

Under the flickering northern lights, the caravan of the snows moves steadily forward on its path across the frozen lakes twisting along forest trails. The gleaming headlights of a red or vellow tractor search out that of the driver of the snowpiow.

He must be able to recognize danger signals, a threadlike crack in the snow which means an opening in the lee five feet below. He must recogthe way around the bends of the portage roads, seeming something more than mere machines, Lyn Harrington writes in The Chrisian Science Monitor.

Behind them in serried ranks come the sleighs, their runners squeaking over the frosty snow, or slipping along noiselessly over "sugar-snow." A series of tractors, each pulling its own group of sleighs, lurches and himself driving toward the open pitches through the night and all the long day. They carry tons of provisions, oil, kerosene, plaid wind-breakers, and dressed lumber into the distant posts of the Hudson's Bay Company, to the northern missions, At the right season of the year they to free-traders and to the Depart-

The West's and Simpson's are two typical farm families of Eastern Canada. During the depression, they ran into low prices for their produce, and hard times. There was no money to spare; the farm fences fell into disrepair, the buildings went without paint; and trees, shrubs and flowers were luxuries they just couldn't afford.
