Baked Potatoes With Sour Cream 3/3 cup chopped onion tablespoons butter 41/2 cups sliced, cooked potatoes 2 cup ready-to-eat bran

4 tablespoons (1 oz.) grated cheese cup sour cream 2 eggs, beaten a teaspoon salt 8 teaspoon pepper

Method - Cook onion in butter ntil a golden color. Place half he potatoes in buttered casserole, sprinkle with part of the onion, bran crushed to fine crumbs and grated cheese. Pour over this, half the sour cream and beaten eggs mixed together. Repeat, using remaining ingredients, season with salt and pepper and bake in moderate oven (350°F.) for 30 minutes.

Yield: 6 servings. For once I seem to have things in proper order, with a dessert idea coming last, instead of up around the start, as is customary with me. Several years ago, during a pro-longed drought in Australia, the wild creatures of the bush became so thirsty that they braved even the dangerous dooryards of settlers for a drink of water. So the settlers, whose cattle and sheep died like flies for lack of water, were constantly on the lookout lest these wild creatures drink what little water was left, Each man hung a loaded gun near the doorway to be used at a moment's notice.

Such a call came one hot sumer's day. Instantly the settler seized his gun and stood ready. Out of the bush a mother kangaroo, with a young one in her pouch, came loping across the brown, powdery open space surrounding the louse. Nearer and nearef she came, her beautiful brown eves fixed beseechingly on the settler. She made her way straight to the tub of water placed there for the use the few domestic animals that had survived. Still the settler did no

The water reached, she waited, her soft gaze still fixed on the man, while the young kangaroo in her pounch drank its fill. Then she turned, without taking a drop for herself, and loped back across the parched open space and on into the tangled depths of the bush. The settler watched her until she disappeared. Then he hung up his gun and, with a choking in his throat, went back to work.

it had been chosen for the lovely verse that was in it. Little things like that are heart-warming and so very welcome — even if one's birth-day isn't. How nice it is to have friends. You know, I often think the best thing about this poor old world is the people in it. So why worry about a birthday—a year, more or less, what does it matter? We are never really old until we think we are. And we never need to think we're old as long as we can take an interest in what goes

One day I told an oldish person, on her birthday, that I hoped she would have many more happy birthdays. She answered—"Well, I don't know—I'm not sure that I want many more birthdays."
What an unhappy attitude towards portunity for education, recreation, and a business or profession. The only opportunity denied them is a chance to stand on their own feet and prove that they have what it takes to make their own way in the world. Old people are not given enough consideration. Surely ou whole social structure would greatly improved if more though were given to the problem of those, still independent in spirit but unable to fend for themselves. We mustn't have our old folk hoping they will not have many more birthdays. Old people should be accepted as the responsibility of the young Unfortunately this responsibility which may last for a week, when tree and bush and vine are on the breathless verge of leafing out. It is then that you stand on a hillside and look across the wooded valley and see the scarlet and orange of maple biossoms like a touch of pastel crayon across the tree-tops. You see greenish yellow in the tops of the wineglass elms, and the amber green fountain that is the big weeping willow beside the brook.

These generalities, so to speak, you see at a glance; and you know the breathless moment is here. Then you look at particulars. The crab apple trees in the orchard are dressed in green lace, their leaves The lilacs are all tufted at their stem ends, each leaf cluster tipped with a faint brownish purple and not a leaf among them as big as a squirrel's ear. The wild black-berries have scarlet tassels not half an inch long, each tassel an unfold ing group of leaves whose form can already be faintly seen. The late apple trees have gray silver nubs at their twig tips; draw down a branch and look closely and you see each nub as a young leaf cluster emerg-ing from its bud, each leaf the size of a ladybug's wing and each red tipped as though blushing. The privet has a leaf tuft like a minia-ture green magnolia, and the bridal wreath bush is green at every join with little green rosebud leaves. These things you see now, this instant. An hour from now all will be changed; tomorrow it will be still different. For this is the trembling moment when life stands between bud and leaf, between
