MEN OF RESOURCE-

NO OTHER BUSINESS presents such a challenge to young Canadians as farming. As a way of life it demands skill, ability and character to a high degree.

Anyone can make a living of sorts in the But to be a really successful farmer a man needs a wide variety of abilities and qualities. Coupled with good health, common sense and a genuine love of the land, he must be some thing of a soil technician, a crop expert, gardener, orchardist, blacksmith, electrician, carpenter, butcher, veterinarian, mechanic, lumberman, weatherman and business man.

He needs common sense to judge what to grow and to determine the best time for plowing and seeding and to solve the enormous number of minor and major difficulties that arise on

In addition he requires an acute market sense to judge the best time for selling or withholding crops or animals. There is little use in disposing of - or growing - certain crops or stock when the market is glutted with them. As for the other skills

"Paw, the tractor has broken down again. Can you fix it? "Dad, will you take a look at the grey mare She's gone a little lame and I think she's picked

"The kitchen roofs leaking again, Dad. Could you patch it, please?" "Dad, we're going to need some ham before long. How about butchering that big hog like you promised?" 'How much seed do we need for the back forty and what are we going to plant?" And so on, and so on..... Many farmers live so far from town they cannot call in experts they need even if they can afford to. They must rely on their own wits and ingenuity. The fact that so many do this with so much efficiency places the Canadian farmer on a high level of intelligence and capability.

CASTING THE WORLD'S HOROSCOPE-

- By Lewis Milligan -

SCIENTISTS TODAY dismiss astrology as an ancient and exploded superstition, and they laugh at the idea that the conformation and motion of the stars have any influence upon iliairs and that future events may be foretold by a horoscope. Nevertheless, the superstition dies hard. The desire to peer into the future is deepseated in human nature, and it is not confined to the patrons of astrologists, teacup readers and palmists. Scientists themselves, sociologists and economists have in recent years been practising fortune-telling on a large scale. Jules Verne, Bellamy and Wells practised it in fiction with considerable accuracy and their works were immensely popular.

Political economists and Socialists have long been gazing into the magic crystal and seeing things that are going to happen, and they have drawn up a variety of plans for averting them. So far their predictions have not been very accurate, and their theories and plans were chiefly responsible for bloody revolutions, the two greatest wars in history, the present social unrest, and the division of the world into two militarized ideologies. "The best laid schemes o' mice and men gang aft agley,' and the planned

Utopias are as far if not farther off than ever Scientists are prominent among the latest gazers into the future, and they are forecasting terrible things, not only for nations but for the entire human race. They are casting the world's horoscope, and their misfortune-telling is alarming many people. They warn us that the planet is rapidly becoming over-populated, and that the resources of life are being depleted at such a rate that the human race will perish from starvation. Aldous Huxley has been studying this horoscope and has dramatized it in his latest book, "Ape and Essence." He paints horrible pictures of the future of mankind as a result of overcrowding, soil erosion, bad farming, deserts spreading, forests dwindling and the leaching out of minerals. Listen to this and

He says the world is in the hands of Belial - mankind is possessed of the devil. I As I walked down town this morning I noticed that the trees were breaking into leaf and blossom, the lawns were green, the tulips were blooming, and hosts of bright-eyed children, youths and maidens were wending their way to school. I felt like reciting Browning's "God's in His heaven - all's right with the world!" But Huxley's horoscope cast a shadow over the scene. Of the other great scourage of mankind, famine, it may be observed that it is not in the nature of things that the increase of population should absolutely produce one. This increase though rapid, is necessarily gradual; and as the human frame cannot be supported, even for a very short time. without food, it is evident that no more human beings can grow up than there is provision to maintain. But though the principle of population cannot absolutely produce a famine, it prepares the way for one; and by frequently obliging the lower classes of people to subsist nearly on the smallest quantity of food that will support life, turns even a slight deficiency from the failure of the seasons into a severe dearth of the principal causes of famine.

Seasonal crop failures continue today, as in Malthus' day, and in addition there are worn-out ada is because it has the complet lands which we must rehabilitate if they are to produce crops as luxuriantly and as readily as in behind it. It is odd, isn't it, that as the more cautious experts do, the world's food situation still calls for attention.

Such vast figures are hard to grasp, so let's, take just two examples. Java, which today is bursting at the seams with 47 million people, had only 4½ million in 1815; India's population has doubled since 1872, from 206 million up to an estimated 420 million. If health conditions were further improved in India to the point where they equalled those in Canada, and population in crease kept on at the same rate, within a century there would be enough Indians to populate five earths.
