A dozen men sat in the lamplight at Webb Winters' ranch house The room was laden with tobacco smoke. Bronzed, stern-faced, these men made up the Scissor-Bill Pool. Most of them had families. Eac! of them owned a small herd o Nearly all of them had been cow-

Webb Winters was the last man to get there. He had been delayed in town until after dark. Mae had broken down and cried a lot and Webb had done what he could to comfort her. That had taken time Then he'd gone to the undertaker's and picked out a coffin, which had to be loaded on a wagon and started for Bob Anderson's ranch. He and Mae had hunted up a preacher. So t was almost midnight when Webb joined the others.

Joe Blake looked hard at him. "We'd about decided you wasn't comin'. Some of the boys was in avor of settin' out to find you." Got delayed in town."

"I'll chance it." Webb moved toward the stove. Somebody had made coffee. He filled a tin cup and faced them. Joe Blake and another man had the only two chairs in the cabin. The others sat around on the floor.

"You men know what happened, Webb told them. "Bob got killed. There was more than one of 'em. He was outnumered, but he put u a scrap. There was blood near the door and there was blood outside. He fought 'em 'til they downed him. Are you goin' to help me hunt down the snakes that murdered Bob

"You can count on me," said Joe "We're all with you, I reckon, spoke another man.
"If it's war that Ab Abbott lookin' for," said a lean-faced ma with a scar across his jaw, "he kin find it. Bob Anderson was a white man any way you took him." Others voiced their opinion. The probem was how they would go about this range war. One man was in favor of running off all the Triangle stock they could round up. Another suggested burn off the Triangle range. The lean-faced man with the knife scarred jaw opined that the only way to wipe out a snake den is to umb a gun hammer. The older men, those who had wives and families, kept silent for the most part. rength of the Triangle outfit They would be bucking a million dollar spread, and Ab Abbott's cowboys were all tough hands. Ab Abbott had threatened that would break up the Scissor-Bill

Pool and run every man of them out of the country. This was not the first meeting of the Pool ranchers. They had met at Joe Blake's "If I was you," spoke one of the place the last time. Joe Blake had been elected boss of the Pool. The crowd, "I wouldn't do much night others now waited for that tight-

"Ab Abbott," Webb cut in, his voice harsh, "hasn't enough money to buy me out. Bob Anderson and me was sort of partners. Bob got nurdered. If you feel like sellin'. go ahead." "You mean you're declarin' wa on the Triangle?" asked Joe Blake. "Just that. Even if I have to make a lone fight of it." "I'll hang and rattle with you," said the knife-scarred cowboy who spoke with the soft drawl of a Texan. "Me and Ed. Young come up to Montana from down yonder. We was raised together from kids They bushwhacked Ed. I'll string my bets along with yourn, Webb. I don't blame Joe Blake for not wantin' to mess into a fight. Like he says, he's got a wife and kids. So has some of you other gents. You kin sell out or you kin set ack and do nothin', and no hard feelin's. I kin git in touch with some boys that will be willin' to o a little fightin'. Tex Jones ain't ackin' for friends." "We won't have to carry it that ar, Tex." said Webb Winters. "We lon't want to hire any killers. My idea is this. We'll play our cards close to our bellies. Somebody in some day in town and talk. Then we'll grab him and get the name of the men who killed Ed Young and Bob Anderson. And there at Bob's place is a big old cottonwood with a low limb that will take care of 'em. Men, no matter how you feel about this business, about your wives and families, you had better either sell out or be ready to fight.

What's been said tonight or on other nights is just among us. Any man that tells a Triangle man what we talk about is lower down than snake."

'I don't reckon," said Joe Blake, "that any man among us would go to Ab Abbott with any news." I ain't so sure about that," said lean-faced Tex.
