Grow The British Sovereign Strawberries These magnificent plants grow 14 inches high, yield 5 crops on the one planting. That is, if planted in 1951, they will yield crops until 1956 without replanting.

Berries are large, sweet and firm. The average size of the berry is 5 inches in circumference. A single plant will yield 250 berries during its cycle of production. They start to bear about May 24th and last to July 1st.

These plants were first originated in the Coastal region of British Columbia during the visit of the Royal couple and have been named in their honour. Since then they have become the most favoured berry with market gardeners and commercial growers. They do well in heavy soil, and have been proven most lavoured berry with market gardeners and commercial growers. They do well in heavy soil, and have been proven to be far more disease-resistant in the wet climates. However, since we started them in the dry interior region, we have found that they withstood 35 below zero weather, and last summer shipped 1500 crates of berries over 1000 miles by railway, and were commended by our customers, who stated they were the finest berries ever to be marketed in Western Canada.

The greatest merit of the British Sovereign is that the berries contain their full sugar content when semi-ripe, thus giving a longer period of marketing.

GOING TO START SMOKING A PIPE? Here's Some Advice That May Be Helpful

There are many men who are not getting the fullest satisfaction out of their pipes, and many others who would like to smoke a pipe but have never made a success of it: so I sought the advice of Messrs. Alfred Dunhill, Ltd., on how to make the most of your smoke, writes "An Old Briar Boy" in

The natural inclination of a man who decides to try a pipe is to buy a cheap one at first to see whether he likes pipe-smoking. That is his first mistake and the one likely to

Oldest Are Best.

Feed the tobacco into the bowl between your fingers in one continu ous stream. The question of how much tobacco you put in depends, of course, upon your own strength of draw. At first the tendency is to pack too much into the bowl. The best soning process it leaves the wood time for one is after a meal, when porous with the result that the you settle down and relax, and give vourself up consciously to the e joyment of your smoke. A good Bruyere pipe is made from dead wood. It is cut from the Bruvere shrub, which grows in hot, North African desert.

The most valuable are those which, after living to a great age, have died naturally in the ground. Seasoned naturally whilst still living and amenable to change, the Bruyere root is light, tough and close-grained, for the fibres have contracted and are not porous. And because it contains no sap a true dead-wood Bruyere will give you nothing but the smoke of the tobacco from the first; and because it is not porous it will smoke for many years without becoming foul. The other popular choice of pipe is the one with a rough finish which, compared with the smooth Bruyere, is a comparatively recent

This is the pipe in which the grain stands out in relief and looks rather like the bark of a tree. It was discovered by accident. Alfred Dunhill in 1914 was experimenting with Algerian briar which sed a beautiful grain. Results, however, were disappointing due to the fact that the Algerian briar root is spongy and full of sap. Tests were discontinued and the unused blocks of root put on one side and forgotten.

The room in which they were left happened to be next to a furnace, and months later it was noticed that the heat had dried and shrunk them so that the grain stood out in relief. Eventually a method of seasoning was perfected, and the spongy

Tobaccos are classified mild, medium and full strength or strong. Here again the mistake of the newcomer to pipe-smoking is to be frightened of a full strength and choose a mild tobacco. The result is that he burns his tongue. Generally speaking, the stronge he tobacco the cooler it will burn.
