For between the rabbit ball and the modern habit of playing for a whole flock of runs at a crack, the ancient and highly interesting art of laying them down is becoming just about as hard to find as a two-bit full ** * *

Present-day scarcity of bunting was especially noticeable quite re-cently when the Boston Braves and the Brooklyn Dodgers staged a 16-inning affair at Ebbets Field with the home club finally squeezing out a 2 to 1 victory (The "rabbit" must have been out waiting for General MacArthur or some such.) Skipping to the season of 1939 we find the pair at it again—a 2-all tie which lasted 23 innings. But this was merely an appetizer the meals they were to set before the fans the following year. For on July 5, 1940, the Dodgers and Braves set a brand-new record. Our morale was given an enormous boost by a description to the American Chemical Society, of a device for supplying arid coastal areas with fresh water. The gadget essentially is nothing more than a big evaporating pan filled with sea water and covered with a giass top. The sun beats through the glass, leating and evaporating the water. Wind and air keep the glass top cool, so that the vapour condenses and runs off through gutters into a tank as distilled water.
