

This Man Just Can't Stay "On The Level"

He's going down again—the man who can't stay level. Hero of the world's first stratosphere survey, Professor August Piccard now plans a deep-sea dive into the ocean.

At a point midway between Naples and Sicily, where the blue Mediterranean is unusually clear, the tow-headed Belgian scientist is preparing a diving bell descent to nearly a mile below the sea, one of the most dangerous diving trips ever attempted.

Frogman's Peep
On an earlier shallow dive in the Gulf of Guinea off West Africa, a frogman peeped through the porthole of the balloon-shaped bathysphere and found the Professor and his companion quietly playing chess. The Professor played a decent 5,000 feet—but then water leaked into the electric system, the shell of the sphere was twisted out of shape, and "Piccard called home to his wife. "Too risky, Mama!"

Yet the amazing Piccard has been taking risks all his life. Peering through thick-lensed spectacles at the highest-ever, lowest-ever tops of the known world, his scientific inquiries—his cosmic ray specialties—took him to the peak of Mount Blanc and down into the deepest volcanic mine.

Terrific Farwell
Back in 1930 he already middle-aged, a devoted family man with a son and three daughters, when he determined to explore the highest reaches of the sky. Though he pioneered stratosphere travel he personally had everything to lose and little to gain. He scraped the bottom of the barrel to finance his first altitude balloons.

His wife and children wept as they bade farewell. Then a luxurious anti-max interrupted. The balloon was too heavy and failed to rise. But August Piccard kept trying. The cramped, instrument-packed gondola was re-designed. One summer morning just twenty-one years ago Piccard again zoomed skyward.

The event created unprecedented excitement. Cars raced over the Alpine road following the balloon. The world imagined that the strung-neck scientist was as good as dead. If lack of oxygen did not get him, it was argued, the cosmic rays would kill.

Terrific Silence
For a day and a night a blanket of terrible silence fell on the expedition. Dismayed Madame Piccard gave her husband up for dead. Then an Alpine shepherd found Piccard scrambling down a mountain-side. After reaching the record height of nearly ten miles, the balloon had landed on a glacier.

Ill daybreak the professor and his colleague, Max Cosyns, slept inside the sphere, cosy and warm. Though their scientific findings had been disappointing, they had proved the trip possible.

But never again! said Piccard. The National Foundation for Scientific Research backed him. Within a few weeks Piccard had nearly $40,000 for fresh experiments.

The following year the balloon went up and in barely three hours the Piccard craft broke another height record of nearly ten and a half miles. This time results were all that had been expected. As they neared the maximum height the cosmic rays increased in intensity till they could be felt beating on the balloon like rain. Far below the landscape seemed like a flat plain. And when the balloon descended the scientists yelped with joy.

Fresh New Fashions Beat Early Fall Heat

BY EDNA MILES
The transitional days that lead from summer into early fall, there are many spots of really hot weather. These are the days for which summer's wilted cottons are not quite right. Yet, who wants to don a wool dress or even a crepe, the ad writers notwithstanding?

What a woman really wants on such a day is a dress without clutter, one that washes like a slip and possesses the smartness of complete simplicity.

Such dresses, offering the maximum in wrinkle resistance, are to be had for the shopping. In all-dacron or in mixtures of nylon and cotton they take little or no ironing. Since upkeep is simple, they're always on hand—fresh and ready to wear.

Stripes lead themselves particularly well to these end-of-the-summer standbys and often are worked in vertical and horizontal combinations.

Aiding the air-conditioned effect created by the sheer fabrics are no sleeves or mere cap sleeves. Colors are clear and sharp—praline, navy, shrimp, blue, charcoal or red used in combination with white.

← An unclustered dress for late summer is this dacron one-piece that washes as readily as a slip. Navy stripes on white are vertically in the skirt. A two-piece design it has a buttoned bodice with a huge bow.

In 15-denier nylon-and-cotton, this dress is just right for late summer. It comes in a variety of colors and patterns. Navy stripes on white are vertically in the skirt. A two-piece design it has a buttoned bodice with a huge bow.
