when he was called back into service from his $100,000 per year job as an outfielder-hitter, public sympathy switched to him. Here was an older man who had done a full hitch of combat flying; a man whose big earning power couldn't last much ionger. And he had to give up everything and go back to work at an Army captain's pay.

But while many were shedding tears for him, Ted Williams said: "My case is not unusual. A lot of men besides me liams said: "My case is not unusual. find all the world at peace. But men are being called, and it it's my turn, it's my turn."

And what a job he did of getting himself back into shape and hitting 407 when he finally returned to baseball near the end of last season!

Then came that broken shoulder in the first 20 minutes of 1954 practice. From that accident there developed a new sidelight on Williams, the man who supposedly didn't get along with sports writers, wanted no part of them.

After the accident, he was whisked away from the clubhouse for an examination to determine the extent of the mishap. He left in his baseball pants, with a large blanket around his shoulders.

Later, when it was time to return to the clubhouse, others suggested that Ted instead go right to bis living quarters, to avoid the crowd and to rest. But he insisted on returning immediately to the ball park "because all of the writers are expecting me."

Now fandom is beinning to appreciate Williams. And why not? In baseball and in armed combat Williams has been great. Everybody is rooting for him to have one more big year. In a way, the case of Ted Williams is not unlike that of Jack Dempsey. As long as he was champion, Dempsey was far from popular. But after he was beaten he became a public idol.
