"Goodyear Tire Company of Toronto dismissed a worker for using vile language to a foreman who had rebuked him for being absent for thirty minutes from a machine which he was supposed to attend.

The workman appealed against the dismissal, and an arbitration board ruled that the Company must reinstate him in his job and pay him wages for the time he had lost.

In passing judgement, the Board commented that the language complained that the language complained that the language complained of was common parlance among industrial workers and therefore its use was not a pumishable offence.
