Coffee Grounds For Divorce

Coffee is up in price and, according to experts, will be still dearer. It's a case of greater demand. All over the world people are drinking more coffee.

In some parts of Arabia people drink as many as 30 cups of coffee a day. The fact that one husband there failed some time ago to keep his wife supplied with coffee was considered cruelty and legal grounds for In Europe they have been drinking coffee since 1683, when the Turks were defeated at Vienna. An Austrian soldier was rewarded by his Emperor for bravery by being allowed to take anything he wished from some of the Turks who were his prisoners. He took from one Turk a recipe which showed how "per-fect coffee" could be brewed. When he was demobbed, the Austrian opened a coffee-house in Vienna—the forerunner of coffee-houses all over the world. London used to have 3,000 coffee-houses. Today they are becoming popular again in the capital and other big cities. national beverage many people used it as a household medicine against diseases. Some people there still use coffee as a general disinfectant and eye lotion.

At one time coffee drinking in Germany was permitted to only a few very wealthy holders of government licences. Men were employed to spy on people to see that they did not drink it. They used to follow the smell of roasting coffee to seek out The smell of roasting coffee is unique and lasting. Sailors have said that they can smell green coffee in the warehouses and plantations of Brazil more than a hundred miles out to sea. What a terrible din there'd be

Bad Writing

A newly formed organization

if we all made as much noise

"Handwriting Foundation, Inc.," has set out to restore legibility to American script. This news alone is almost as heartening as the innovation of the "typewriter signature" which took place around 1918. If the endeavor succeeds we will have witnessed a revolution comparable to the invention of the typewriter itself. Not that bad handwriting is a problem of the present day alone. There is, of course, the story (perhaps apocryphal) which Mark Twain tells about Horace Greeley's atrocious handwriting. Answering one of his loyal subscribers, a good lady in Kansas whose son had acquired an obsession for making turpentine wine, Mr. Greeley sent a letter by his own pen. I appeared completely illegible, and the key sentence was deciphered at first: "Boston, botany cakes, folony undertakes but who shall allay? This seemed highly irrelevant Another and third attempt got no better results. "Butter but any cakes, fill any undertaker we'll wean him from his filly." Finally, one of Mr. Greeley's clerks sent a translation: "But diet, bathing, etc. etc., followed uniformly, will wean him from his folly." We know a man who, in his childhood, was first taught vertical writing, then backhand, then "Spencerian." The result must be seen to be believed. (This editorial, it so happens, was written in long hand. There were considerable doubts, while transcribing it the next morning, as to what was originally said .- From The Christian Science Monitor.

CHRONICLES GINGER FARM

After hearing reports of the awful snowstorms in Manitoba it seems incredible that we were annoyed yesterday because it was warm and sunny! "Annoyed . . . because it was warm and sunny?" Yes, but wait until you hear why. For several weeks Bob and Joy had been wanting us to go down some Sunday for a turkey dinner. The catch was this: The turkey was in the freezer so we had to let them know Friday night if we were coming on Sunday. All last week we planned to go as of yesterday. Then came Friday. All through the day the weather forecast was for mild weather with some snow, changing to rain or freezing rain on Sunday. That fixed it. There was already quite a bit of snow around the barn so that melting snow, plus freezing rain, meant plenty of shovelling for partner, ditches to keep the water backing up into the stable. I phoned Joy and explained the situation. Then came Saturday - dull, thawing a bit, but no rain, although it was still predicted. Then Sunday . . a lovely day, the nicest Sunday one could possibly wish for. So now think you will understand. The "probs" couldn't have been more wrong.

Motorists were certainly taking advantage of the good weather yesterday. A steady hum of cars on the highway all day long. Different from ten years ago when the travelling public avoided this road because of its numerous potholes. The road was a hazard then to motorists - now it is a hazard to pedestrians. And half of them don't realize it. Time after time I have passed people walking on the wrong side of the road. That is bad enough in daylight but at night it is - or might be - a short cut to Eternity. If a person who usually drives a car has to walk on the highway, you can be almost certain he won't be found walking on the wrong side of the road. And of course we have children, on bi-when the Irish and their descendants celebrate, this week, the birthday of their patron saint, they can include football in the list of sports events for which a native of the Emerald Isle is responsible. For it was an Irishman who invented Rugby, still played as such in all parts of the Empire. It is also the game from which our own Canadian football descended by a series of stages. The legend that Rugby was transformed from soccer to a more volatile game in which carrying the ball was invented quite by accident, is perfectly true. And it was an Irishman who, perhaps involuntarily, made the transformation. There is a monument on the campus of Rugby, a famed English school, that bears the inscription:

This stone commemorates the exploit of William Webb Ellis, who, with a fine disregard for the rules of football as played in bis time, first took the ball in his arms and ran with it, thus originating the distinctive feature of the Rugby game. A.D. 1823. Now, it seems, the young man who performed in such unorthodox fashion, was an Irishman who had gone to ancient Rugby school for further education. And possibly, it was no accident that Master Ellis picked up the ball and ran with no accident that Master Ellis picked up the ball and ran with no accident that Master Ellis picked up the ball and ran with it. He had, no doubt, played or was acquainted with Gaelic football in his homeland. The Gaelic game from time immemorial allowed handling of the ball, unlike soccer. So it was intuitive on Ellis' part to grab the ball and "dribble" it a few steps before kicking on the run. The trouble was, he ran all the way across the goal.

It was typical of sports-minded Britons, who know a good thing and a dramatic thing when they see it on the field of play that, instead of heaping reproaches on the young Irishman for a breach of ethics, they turned his error into a game, and built him a monument. And, as always, they phrased it well. The wording, "with a fine disregard for the rules" could be developed only in a country that appreciates freedom of thought and action so much that it forced the Magna Carta at Runnymede. was, he ran all the way across the goal.

Master Ellis meant no harm, no offence to the sports code. His innocent idea of soccer was to latch onto a loose ball and run it. And so a game was born. At the time, 132 years ago, Rugby was a school; not the label of a football game. The sports identification came later, all thanks to a young Irishman.

Saved By a Cat

Does a cat possess some strange nstinct which enables it to sense impending disaster?

They are asking this question in Düsseldorf, Germany, follow ing an amazing incident when a storm, accompanied by an eighty-mile-an-hour gale, raged over the city a short time ago. A man named Paul Kleun, living with his wife in three rooms, always feeds his cat at the same hour every evening. As usual that night he put down her plate of minced meat, expecting h to eat it quickly, for he knew she must be hundiy.

To his surprise the cat refused to touch it; and then, as the storm raged, began to run excitedly up and down between her owner and the door of his bedroom. The puzzled man went to the door and opened it. At that moment came a great crash as ceilings and walls collapsed. Great pieces of stone and brick hurtled down on to the spot where the man had been standing a few moments earlier.

He was uninjured—saved by the door frame in which he was ed the house. His wife, who was death, although she was pinned under wreckage. The man and his wife are convinced that that cat's "sixth sense" enabled her to foresee the For days before a great vol-

London Skunks Ara Air - Conditioned

The authorities of the London Zoo faced a problem when they decided they had too little space to display all the animals they wished - and too many iron bars to show off even the animals they had.

Now they are to spend £1 million in gradually rebuilding the Zoo, restoring its old pres-tige as the finest and most modern in the world. In the new Zoo only sportive monkeys and some of the wild birds will live in cages. Ingenious tricks of lighting and ventilation will ensure that few of the other creatures will wish to leave their own quarters-on the farside Even snakes can be openly displayed on warm islands of sand circled by frozen temperature zones which they will have no desire to cross. Tropical birds can be contained in sunlit compartments walled by darkness. Clever lighting will enable visitors - nearly three milion a year on average - to view the birds without themselves being seen. The allotted area of the Zoo in Regents Park, restricted to thirty-six acres, allows no space for expansion. So Zoo development is to be upwards. The new animal houses are to be several stories high, with covered ramps leading to centrally-heated apartments for pumas and perhaps an attractive roof garden for giraffes.

This means a new deal for 3,500 animals, but many unusual questions had to be answered before young architect Frank Stenglehofen could complete his plans. "What is the farthest a tiger has ever been known to leap?" he asked one day, and found that the defence ditch in the tiger house would have to be at least twenty-five feet wide. Visitors to the Zoo are sometimes worried by the pungency of skunks and wild cats. Stenglehofen experimented with de-odorants, but this robbed the cats of their enjoyment of their own aroma. Thermostats controlling the precise degree of temperature will give beasts accustomed to warm climes greater comfort than ever before. Some smaller mammals will be kept instincperished in the disaster? tively in check and prevented
