It is such a bright, sunny morning it just makes you feel glad to be alive. And yet it is cold - ten above by our two thermometers - so we still feel as if we are definitely in the grip of winter. But it doesn't seem to matter - it can't last too much longer. The birds know it and so do the trees and shrubs. The willow branches are getting a yellowish colour and the dogwoods a little redder every day. Crows are flying, not just one now and then, but by twos and threes they are leaving the woods exploring the fields and coming closer to the buildings. Watching nature's reawakening just before the spring is beautiful and inspiring. It is so big, so very big, that all our man-made plans seem small and insignificant by comparison. Each generation has its span and is gone but the natural forces of nature go on, century after century, changing only as the seasons change.

Even now, as our thoughts turn to spring, we look around and see more snow than we have had all winter. Actually, there hasn't been a day this winter when our lane has really been blocked. So different from conditions existing in other parts of the Continent. And we don't have to go many miles from home either to notice the difference. Last Thursday a friend and I went to Guelph to visit a convalescing patient. The weather was just grand when we left here but ten miles from home it was another story nowflurries swirling across the fields and along the highway. We wondered what we were heading into but we went on our way. And then, coming back, we found good weather again as soon as we crossed the invisible boundary

I was also in Toronto last week - on the only other good day that we had. My time was taken up with business matters until two-thirty and then I was free to visit with Daughter and David. Dave, I am glad to say, was full of life and mischief, very different from the little boy we knew a couple of months ago. Children are up and down so quickly. We get so worried about them and then first thing you know they are back to normal. Too bad older people haven't the same bounce!

wish that particularly just now because so many of our friends have been seriously ill this winter. Maybe when the bude are swelling, birds singing and spring flowers peeking up through the soil, everyone will feel better. I sincerely hope so anyway.

Now, excitement in TV is foon ninety-minute live as without, mercifully, any us thought of a toll. live TV better than filmed Surely there can be no ous doubt that it is. People, ourse, do watch filmed TV do enjoy it because often the only way to see cershows and personalities. this does not mean that prefer it. Give the set chance to express a cice and he would vote over-elmingly in favor of "live." Silvers as Sergeant Bilko Lucille Ball as Lucy Ricarare amusing on film, but would not rather see them e?" The only real question why is this so?

The fundamental nature of TV provides the answer.

one of the mass media, it re-ves from an audience's conusness the factors of time distance. Radio can let the vidual know what is hap-ng at the moment it hap-but cannot enable him to it. The motion picture one to the scene but at the moment that an takes place. In both cases. intrusion by either time or nice separates the individhand, bridges the gap instantly and unites the individual at home with the event afar The viewer has a sense of being in two places at once. Physically, he may be at his hearthside but intellectually, and, above all, emotionally, he is at the camera man's side.

Both the player in the studio and the audience at home have an intuitive awareness of being in each other's presence. This awareness, not anything elec-tronic, is responsible for the elusive rapport that can extend from a Maine farmhouse to a Hollywood stage.

The foundation of this rapport is a shared experience in immediacy of the present.

In filmed TV, one of the two vital parties concerned - the player — completed his emo-tional involvement perhaps weeks or months earlier: the audience, in effect, is catching up. But in live TV, both the star and the spectator are tied together by the stronge of all possible bonds. Neither knows what the next minute will bring forth; it has not been lived yet Both player and viewer know this accord to be true, both feel it and, most important, both respond to it. The actor versed in all media can attest that there is a special hollow in the pit of the stomach as one "goes on" in front of a live audience. There is no turning back, no retakes, no second chance. It is playing for the money. Even a hardened viewer cannot be immune to the contagion; he commits himself to the excitement or apprehension of the moment. Will there be a triumph or disaster? Uncertainty is the price less stimulus on both sides of the screen. The question is often asked why a filmed show, when made under conditions seemingly identical with those prevailing in the case of a live program, still should seem different. There is ample. If there is one thing in the theatre that cannot be faked or simulated, it is an opening night. And all of live TV is an opening night. There may be previews galore and they should seem like the real thing, but they never are. Maybe the explanation is pure ly psychological, something that, after all, perhaps should not be explained, only appreciated. But that a viewer does let a psychological prejudice play a part in his attitude toward film cannot be seriously dis-puted; he can hardly do other wise, because the television industry is determined to remine him that there is such a diffforme. Instead of minimizing seem to accentuate them. No only do these policies add to the woes of many types of film-shows, they are also adversely Great areas of the land relive TV. The basic trouble with TV shows on film is the cockeyed concept of perfectionism that motivates their production. The celluloid impresarios are so preoccupied with technical factors that they are not unlike the mechanic who finds an automobile's engine more interesting than its passengers. To the art of make-believe they apply a set of calipers.

Perish the thought that an actor should hesitate over a line; far better that he be letter-perfect, even if he must say the lines without comprehending their meaning. Let the cowboy sing as he rides the dusty trail, but never let the audience hear the sound of a horse's foot or the rustle of a breeze. Nature must be presented at 33½ revolutions per minute.

Take applause and laughter. A situation comedy on film may be quite acceptable until from left field comes a wave of tinny, doctored and apportioned guifaws. Strips of this pre-packaged approval are pieced into the film in what some wan director nopes are the right spots.

Usually, he guesses wrong.
Above all, filmed TV fears the lull. There must be no pause. If a half-hour show isn't uproarious, shoot two hours and snip out with a pair of scissors the best thrifty minutes. Even the amusing Groucho Marx is caught in this cage of the precisionists. His ad libs fall out exactly on cue and his guests never falter as straight men. Groucho provides humor, to be sure, but he cannot conceal from the audience that it is carefully pre-sliced. — From The New York Times Magazine.

He makes it clear that to say the Canadian north is all of a piece is a great misconception. He emphasizes, whether in puncturing the leg-end of a hidden tropical yalley or in showing that a rich mountain of mercury ore is uneconomic to mine because of distance, that the north is not a to be as heavily populated as the rest of Canada. He points out that as yet the land has only two important resources: fur and minerals. Water power has
