Married Best Man By Mistake

How many of us, at some period in our lives, have benefited by a lucky mistake? An error, purely imaginary, of course, in filling in their coupons - something they would have altered if the wife or daughter had not foolishly posted the coupon - has proved a dazzling stroke of fate for several people lately. And, equally, a mistake may lie at the heart of romance or confer on two people happiness they never imagined possible. Just two summers ago, Norwegian girl won a state football prize of $6000. Being young and lovely, a flaxen-haired ice princess, as one newspaper described her, she found herself inundated by offers of marriage. Several suitors presented themselves in person. With an eye to future luxuries, she picked on one, a wealthy silver fox breeder's son. She skated, ski'd and danced with him. Her enchantments seemed to him divine. He soon "dated" her for

Came the wedding day in a tiny country church near Lillehammer, and by an incredible mix-up over the names of bridegroom and best man, a vague-minded pastor married the girl to the latter. In the vestry his blunder was pointed out "Well", said the bridegroom, "you'll have to conduct the wedding ceremony all over again, and marry me to Helga -not him!" Then the girl cut short his apologies with startling finaliarmed, you met a lion face to face in the African bush? Ada Cherry Kearton once put that question to her famous animal-photographer husband, and he replied: "Stare it out."

That's what he'd done one day when he went quail-shooting with a fellow-officer, armed only with small shotgun, became separated from him in the thick scrub and, rounding a bush, suddenly faced a magnificent blackmaned lion only eight feet off. Cherry stood motionless, knowing that the slightest move would sign his death warrant, as they stood staring at each other. At last the lion snarled, showing great curving teeth and his eyes dropped. He lay down, the marl becoming an angry growl, his tail rose, and Cherry knew he was wondering whether to

But his stare, as he stood motionless, seemed to worry the lion, who began to edge slowly back after four or five minutes, with rumbling but slightly puzzled growls. Finally he moved slowly off into the bush. Cherry stood, covered in perspiration, dering if the lion was watching him, then went back to camp. Another time a message came from a kraal in Southern Tanganyika saying that several natives had been killed by a man-eating lion or lioness: could he come to their aid? Cherry set out to track down the killer with two other hunters, but towards evening lost the trail and returned towards the village Cherry and one native going or ahead armed only with a cam-

New-style Archery

Deep in the heart of French Equatorial Africa a party of expert American archers are hunting big game with bows and arrows. Doctors, lawyers and businessmen, each member of this strange safari is allowed to carry two bows and thirty-six arrows and so far the bag has included gazelle, antelope, a lion and two elephants.

This is just the latest facet o the world's fastest-booming sport. Archery has actually be-come adopted for U.S. army training and Ontario has set aside a hunting area of twentyfive square miles signposted for bows and arrows only. No fewer than 15,000 archery addicts will hunt in North
