Nobody wants a repetition last Friday's freezing rain. Of course I had to go down town that day - to a funeral, no less, For that little trip I called a taxi and got a ride home with a neighbour. I wouldn't let our neighbour drive me up the lane slide into the ditch. So I got out of the car at the road, and there I was, absolutely scared to take a step. Farther up there was crunchy snow either side of the lane — if I could only get to it. But that was a big 'if'. And then I saw Partner coming down the lane to meet me. Was ever glad. I might have been on the ice yet if he hadn't appeared on the scene. quite a bit of activity around

The hens were laying particularly well but because of the icy roads the egg man did not collect the eggs. Can't say that I blame him - after all who would want to take a chance or sliding off the road with a truck-load of eggs? And then, as the ice-storm wasn't enough to deal with our cats and dogs got into trouble — just to re-lieve the monotony, I suppose. It was this way: Black Joe picked a fight with a stray feline up in the barn and between them they upset a small open can of crankcase oil all over themselves the hen roosts. And then Joe came to the house for sympathy and first aid! Now I ask you what could a person do for a poor little pussycat plastered with crankcase oil? It couldn't be washed off. Coal oil might have helped but what would the coal oil have done to the poor cat's skin? The best I could do was to rub poor Joe with an old towel. ture at Kruger National Park, South Africa, of a large, blackmaned African lion dozing dreamily on a bouncy, new in ner spring mattress. It is just an advertising stunt for a local mattress compasy, of course, and lions in the Kruger National Park do not ordinarily enjoy such luxury.

Nevertheless, they do come pretty close to a Utopian sort of existence which might well fig-ure in the dreams of other wild animals in less-well-sprung surroundings.

There are no fences there for the lion, elephant, or giraffe. There are no cages, no white hunters with barking rifles, no native poachers with silent, poisened arrows. Thousands of Af-the rangers' only task is to protect them. Some people call this the "zoo without bars." But it is not even that. It is simply a 200-mile-long slice of Africa up to 60 miles wide decreed untouchable in an industrializing nation for the preservation of rapidly diminshing wildlife. It is a normal zoo in reverse, for here the visitor is "caged" - tourists may travel the simple dirt tracks by closed cars, but must remain in them at all times. There are camps for night stops, but even here a curious elephant or lion has, and frequently takes, the right of way to amble through their midst.

There is something of a gen-tleman's agreement — provided you leave the animals alone and stay in your car they are harmless. Rarely do they associate automobile smells with human beings. And sometimes they lend a hand. There was the agitated motorist, for example, whose car stalled and refused to start immediately in the path of half and off he went.

'Don't Fence me in' | a dozen notoriously bad-tempered African clephants. The agitation was unnecessary.

From the animals' point of view, it is all so natural here.
The animals have no artificial fears. They have the sun and they find their food and drink as they always have. As one of the rangers said: "It's just as it should be." When you park your car in a glade and listen to the noises of the bush — a couple of hundred red buck champing softly, the footfalls of a herd of zebra, the treetops gossip of a pair of monkeys, the rustle as a haughty buffalo arches his neck the better to look you over — the free-dom and peace of it all sweep over you.

So unafraid are many of the animals that while hippos and crocodiles remain near water, according to the rangers, lions will often sit on the road edge watching the cars go by. And of our own experience we know the graceful impala buck put out "school patrols" to make sure everyone gets across the "street" after animals, and it is said that some of the younger visitors go to sleep at night counting lions instead of sheep. By all accounts, the lions are getting so used to the tourists that the one on the mattress in that newspaper photograph may have been going to sleep counting cars.
