You can save a life if you can't swim. If someone gets in difficulty near the dock or the side of a pool, lie down, hold on and stretch out your arm, or your leg, and pull the person to safety.

Birds and animals have some method by which they can communicate with humans and likewise many try to convey to them.

Wild animals and birds are similarly gifted, but the occasions are more rare due to the infrequent opportunity presented to them.

One such instance happened as I was driving along a rural highway when I spotted a skunk with its head firmly lodged in an empty milk can.

One's normal reaction in an event such as this would be to get away from there and fast, but as I approached the skunk, I could see that it was trying to attract my help.

So hesitatingly, cautiously, softly talking to it, I stopped, got out and took an awful chance. I lifted the can from his head.

I swear by all that's true, it walked off toward the roadside, turned and faced me, and I could distinctly see it lower its head in a sort of bow.

Thinking something had gone wrong with my skunk, I investigated and found it so tilted that further steps would be sure to fall out.
