HIS MOTHER OBJECTS "Dear Anne Hirst: I am still very much in love with a boy I dated last school term. He said he loved me too, but he has not asked for a date for two months —

Tore Down Houses To Find An Echo

One of the world's most famous echoes has vanished. For centuries this echo, on lovely Lake Balaton, in Central Hungary, has been a household word, but to-day it can no longer be

This is because down the years, as trees grew and new buildings went up, the echo, which reverberated back five or six times from the walls of the mediaeval church that looks over the lake, has been growing fainter. And now it has finally disappeared. Sound engineers were sent there recently to try to restore the echo. They returned and reported that trees would have to be cut down and houses demolished, but even then the elusive echo might still not return.

Echoes have been called the radio stations of nature. Actual-ly, an echo is the throwing back of a sound wave. According to Greek myth, Echo was a nymph who pined away for love Although echoes to-day retain a romantic qualtiy, sonics, the science of sound waves, explains to is how they magnify sound.

As curved mirrors play queer ricks with an image, sound mirrors act similarly with sounds. They "bounce" sound waves from surface to surface, freto a friend. The effect produced in "whispering galleries," like the gal-lrey at St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is really a form of echo. A whisper there will creep across the dome to be picked up with astonishing clearness on the op-posite side, 102 feet away.

When, many years ago, the U.S. House of Representatives met in Statuary Hall, Washington, it was said that the Speaker used to communicate privately with members by means of the dome's "whispering track." A fire later destroyed the dome.

"Nothing much-just the morning paper and a mail-order catalogue." I had already seen a paper and as I was tired I didn't bother to open the catalogue. Next morning I thought I might as well see if there were any summer sale bargains. I found more than I expected. Tucked inside the paper wrapper were two letters - one personal, the other a cheque - interest on a Canada Savings Bond! They could easily have slipped out unnoticed and thereby have caused a lot of embarrassment. I suppose the mailman had tucked them inside the wrapper for safety. It is a method I don't approve of as there is now so much unsolicited advertising sent through the mails one doesn't always look it over too well. Guess I'll watch a bit more carefully from now on. Well, we have the room all right but at first I didn't much like the idea of committing myself to taking anyone. However, I knew these people were in a fix and it seemed mean not to help them out. "Snake-Pit" Test For Bridegroom

The young medical student was desperately in love with the dusky, sloe-eyed daughter of a wealthy banker. But the young man knew that it would be years before he would be able to suport the girl in the way to which she was accustomed.

Then he discovered that the banker was an inveterate gam-bler. So he made an amazing bler. So he made an amazing proposition to him. He would spend the night in a room full of poisonous snakes. If he lived, the daughter, and a fat slice of the banker's savings, would be his. The banker said it was a deal. place in a room in New Delhi. The "snake-pit" test was to take

The reptiles were repulsive creatures, all capable of killing a man instantly. But the student did not seem worry. Into the room he went. Next morning he was let out miling. The banker honoured his bargain but - too late - he learned that his son-in-law had worn a suit of armour while in the room!

Marriage tests are still an accepted practice in many parts of the world. Invariably they call for great courage and determination. In the sun-scorched South African veldt an old farmer devisied a fantastic test for the young man who wished to marry his beautiful, dark-haired daughter.

The young man - Don Esterhuyse - agreed to catch a lioness and milk it to prove he was worthy of the hand of Estelle Joanneson, only daughter of the Transvaal farmer. But despite his powerful physique, Dan had never handled any thing bigger than a kitten!

He had built up a reputation in the area for being a quiet, inoffensive giant. Some people even hinted he might be a cow-

Dan had borne these remarks stoically and in the process he had won Estelle's heart. She was just eighteen, and her father was not prepared to have a son-inlaw who would not command respect when he took charge of the farm.

For a week Dan laid careful plans. He studied the habits of lionesses and as he did so grew more and more aware of the gigantic risks he faced. One swipe from the claws of an enraged beast and he could be ripped to pieces. At the end of the week he presented himself to old man Joanneson and said: "I am ready for The old man grunted. "I will provide you with trackers and a gun. But if you have to use that you will be finished with Estelle." Travelling by truck, they reached lion country late in the afternoon. Leaving his gun in he truck, Dan selected a trail that led towards the setting sun. Leading the trackers. Dan set off. By early evening he had reached a water-hole. The spoor ended there.

Dan rigged up a trap. Then he and the trackers took up position around the water-hole. Shortly afterwards the biggest lioness the experienced trackers had ever seen approached the water hole. It padded forward and dropped neatly into the rage when he found his girl friend entertaining another man in her apartment, Thornton, a forty-eight-year-old company executive, whipped out a revolver. "Now clip off all her hair," ed her deception.

Men More Jealous Than Women? Filled with uncontrol

He bought himself a false beard, and so disguised, tracked he ordered his rival. Geoffrey, the rival, picked up the scissors. Threatened from point-blank range, he had no thought of disobeying. Snip by snip, he loped off the locks of wearing his beard, caught he sitting with him in a station trembling Georgia until she resembled a female Yul Brynner. Madly jealous, Thornton then ordered Geoffrey to treat himself to the shortest of crew-cuts. Apparently, this French Maquis practice of dealing with girls who collaborated with amorous Nazi soldiers seemed to Thornton a proper way of taking vengeance against a woman he professed to love. And by forc-

But this outburst of jealousy led to arrest. Charged with carrying a pistol and threatening to ake his life, he excused himself by saying: "I came here to take her back and marry her. I didn't drive 1,000 miles to find her ar-
