Diamond Selling Intricate Game

Pelican Street in Antwerp, though neither big nor boisterous, is Europe's most dramatic and wealthy street. It is the centre of the world's diamond trade.

But no rough diamonds are sold in Antwerp. About eighty per cent. of all legal "roughs" are introduced into the trade through dealers in Hatton Garden, London's diamond centre.

Once a month Hatton Garden's "sights" are attended by the world's leading buyers. After several days' examination and dealing all purchases are completed and most diamonds are then sent to Antwerp for cutting.

Not long ago, in Pelican Street, a cutter was polishing a diamond worth nearly $15,000. The stone had a small imperfection on its edge and the purchaser wanted it polished.

After cutting and polishing, stones are ready for sale in Antwerp's diamond clubs, the city's four exchanges which are long, high halls furnished only with narrow, bare tables. Sellers sit on the east side of the tables, buyers on the west.

Any disputes later arising are settled by each club's review board. Should a member not abide by the board's ruling he is barred from trading in all the world's fifteen exchanges.

The fine organization of the legal diamond trade is paralleled by that of the black market, a profitable but dangerous game.

Russia, Lebanon and Turkey buy most of the industrial black market diamonds; other stones, through devious and often illegal channels, find their way to Antwerp where they are sold at underground "sights" like those of London's Hatton Garden.

Big Ben Is Having Lean Time

If the ghost of very tall and stout Sir Benjamin Hall ever walks across Westminster Bridge at night, no doubt he's looking up with special interest at the 230 ft. tower of the world-famous clock, Big Ben.

Why? Because it's suddenly been discovered by engineers that Big Ben is leaning. And Sir Benjamin's nicknames were "Big Ben" because of his great bulk.

Cracks don't worry Big Ben much, anyway. The great bell, originally called St. Stephen, weighed fifteen tons and cost $200,000 but it cracked after a few weeks' use. It was recast and reduced to thirteen and a half tons in weight, but cracked again.

REFLECTIONS IN THE SUN - Warmed by the bright Roman sun, these two benches of different generations seem lost in the world of their own thoughts. Bread, love and dreams, perhaps? The pensive girl and news-absorbed old man are seated on a ledge near the Trinita de Monti Church, which overlooks the famed Spanish Steps.

go out and chase them. I have never seen her catch a bird yet but she has all the fun of stalking them. The dogs around here are having a great time too, more or less running around in packs, obviously with a view to mating in the near future.

Of course the roads have been a mess for some time. Mud, slush and salty water. The highways are bone dry but the side-ruts and parking lots - they belong to a different story.

What we had been hoping for - but almost dreading - has finally come. A sharp, sudden thaw. There was so much snow around we had visions of overflowing culverts, flooded basements and uncontrollable water everywhere. Well, there is a silver lining to all this. It has kept it to its proper channels - with a little pressure around we had visions of overflowing culverts, flooded basements and uncontrollable water everywhere.
