A-"Just thinking you are liable to get a cold may tip the balance and make you fall victim to one." These homely medical tips come from Dr. John Eichenlaub whose book, "A Minnesota Doctor's Home Remedies for Com mon and Uncommon Ailments," is selling so well that he promises to become the Dr. Spock of the adult world. Last month, as the book went into its fourth printing (it has sold 50,000 copies), the 38-year-old author explained that his home remedies "aren't folklore, they are medically approved measures to treat minor illnesses." His book is devoted primarily to the ailments which most Americans either think are too silly serious enough to warrant paying the doctor's fees. From trimming corns to treating headaches giving up smoking, Dr Eichenlaub has a home remedy.

Obviously Dr. Eichenlaub's book goes far beyond the scope of a first-aid manual - a fact that has worried some doctors, who suggest that his home remedies may encourage people to treat the symptoms of what could be major illnesses. But studies have shown, Dr. Eichenlaub pointed out, that most Americans experiment with home remedies before seeing a doctor. He hopes his book will "show people which illnesses they can care for themselves, and which ones need a doctor's attention." From NEWSWEEK.

Sacred Site Still Causes Controversy

Of all the shrines in Christendom, none is more sacred - or more shabby - than the 800year-old Church of the Holy Sepulcher in the Jordanian sector of Jerusalem. Built, according to legend, on the site of both the Crucifixion and the Resurrection the crumbling stone church was rocked by an earthquake in 1927, wracked by mortar fire during the Arab-Israeli war in 1948, and ravaged by fire in 1950. Today, only a jungle of massive scaffolding holds the twin-domed shrine together.

Since 1947, there have been five suggested plans for restoring the Holy Sepulcher to its former grandeur. But the six Christian communities (the Roman Catholic, the Greek, Armenian and Syrian Orthodox, and the Egyptian and Ethiopian Coptic) have been unable to agree on what should be done or who should have the privilege of paying.

Last month, however, there was hope that this most holy of Christian shrines can be saved before it collapses in a heap of sacred rubble. Hassan El Katib, the Moslem Governor General of Jerusalem, summoned the Christian architects to his office and told them they couldn't leave until they had initialled some sort of plan. As a result, a tentative agreement has been reached on a $1.5 million repair program to shore up the tottering south transept and façade and the smaller of the two domes. Nothing was said about longdebated plans for adding a Prot estant chapel (there is none now), repairing the main rotunda over Christ's tomb, and clear ing away some of the architec tural clutter. But, even with its objectives sharply limited, the restoration plan could easily be upset by some new outbreak of petty jealousy. So vigorously do the various Christian communities guard their separate perquisites that any agreement is always subject to change.

In the past, disputes have raged over which sect had the right to hang vestments in what clothes closets, and who was going to whitewash the ceiling. It not unusual for the Roman Catholics and the Copts, who say mass at the same time each week in the main rotunda, to try and drown each other out. Last Christmas, a Greek Orthodox group spied a Franciscan standing on a step leading to one of "their" chapels. The fight that ensued was so un-Christian that the Jordanian police had to be summoned. It is no wonder, then, that the new restoration agreement is so tentative. As one Franciscan remarked the other day, while shuffling through a dimly lit passageway: "You can't change a light bulb around here without consulting protocol. That's fering. Thank heaven, mercy why the place is so dark."

Will She Repeat Liz Taylor's Success?

Chestnut-haired Lori Martin, age 13, skipped off an elevator in Rockefeller Center one day recently and bestowed an affectionate kiss on old friend Tab Hunter, who looked almost grown up beside her. A flock of press agents clucked indulgently as the diminutive beauty trained her cobalt blue eyes and dazzling smile on a pair of Newsweek reporters. The star of NBC's new "National Velvet" series, based on the same Enid Bagnold girloves-horse story that catapulted Elizabeth Taylor to glory some fifteen years ago, Lori was in New York for a week of publicity and some fun prior to the series' première. The obvious question was, would theatrical history repeat itself?

Lori has been riding real horses since she was 6 (Liz began at 3). "I try to ride as often as I can," she said," "but we're a modest little family." The family lives in Burbank, Calif., and consists of mother and father (an art director at Warner's), older sister Jean, twin sister Doree, and younger brother Stephen. None of these were overly surprised when Lori, who has appeared in 40 TV plays and a movie, was chosen from among 1,000 applicants for the role of Velvet Brown. "My older sister has a slight tendency to be jealous sometimes," Lori admitted, "but really, all of them are quite nice about it."

Lori herself takes stardom in stride. She owns a Thunderbird ("but my mother drives it for me"), works six hours a day at the studio puts in three more hours tutoring. "My grades are nothing great, but they're cer-While in New York for the

Strange Doings Over In Ulster

Go wandering through Ulste and you'll get a laugh a mile! The wonderful humour of the locals, with their quaint sayings, their superstitions, their anecdotes about women, whiskey and smuggling, make it a glorious place to get away from it all. Travel writer Oswald Blakeston tells many amusing anecdotes illustrating this slap-happy attitude to life.

For instance, during a recent tour, a woman told him of a sonin-law who drove a van but was very short-sighted. When she'd been with him he'd ask: "Do you know this road terribly well, Mary? Do you mind telling me when we get to the corners?" The police had been worried about him, so he'd put a pin in a tree close by where he often met the constable, and one day said to him "Isn't that a pin I see sticking in that tree over there?" He walked across to get it- and tripped over a cow lying in his path.

An old fellow in Killough led Blakeston into a pub and told him how in Newcastle, Co. Down, he'd seen a nun outside one and she'd said, "Don't go in there, it's depraved."

"Ah, sister," he'd replied, "a drop only warms you. Won't you come in and have one? Or let me give you one outside, if you don't care to come into the place your. Finally she'd said, "If you brought it out in a cup. . ." And the barman had exclaimed, "A whskey in a cup! Don't tell me it's that blessed nun again!" Blakeston asked another old chap who was drinking whiskey in a bar: did he get through a bottle a day? "God love you," he answered, "I spill more than

In Sixmilecross Blakeston went into a shop for cigarettes. A traveller taking orders protested to the shopkeeper; "But the last time your mother ordered three dozen cartons."

"That's not my mother, that's my wife," said the shopkeeper. mistake," the travelle apologized with red face. "Oh no," said the shopkeeper, "it's Blakeston was told of an English angling enthusiasts who hired a manor house, fishing rights, and gillie. He caught only one salmon — on his last day. "Do you know," he said, "that fish has cost me £200." "What a good thing, sir, you didn't catch more of them," the gillie replied. At Pettigo on the Eire border local smuggling stories included an account of how cattle are taught to walk backwards so that if they're spotted being smuggled into Ulster to claim the government subsidy, the drover can say they're walking

A clergyman there, Philip the other way! Skelton, suffered from hypochondria and kept on announcing his imminent death from the pulpit until the church-warden said: "Make a date, sir, and stick to it. Don't be always disappoint-

Blakeston records many quaint sayings he heard in a first-rate account of his tour: "Thank You Now". A fisherman finished a funny story: "Man, I haven't laughed so much since the day when my father and mother were married."

When a whole family emerged from a farmhouse to talk to a salesman, Blakeston asked the mother how many children she had. "Do you mean of the same At Victoria Bridge, Tyrone, he kind?" she asked.

At Victoria Bridge, Tyrone, he gave a boy sixpence for showing him the grave of a giant. "I wish I were buried in such a nice big grave so that everyone would treat me decent," said the lad. At Portaferry he asked

"Come on, let's be going," the girl had urged, but he whispered, "One moment, darlin', I think this ould woman is going to commit suicide, and that should be interesting."

Driving through Antrim, Blakeston heard this gem from a traffic cop: "You ought to go round me, sir, whether I'm here or not"

Blakeston tells strange stories of the great houses and castles he visited. Hervey, the Earl Bishop of Derry, who built Downhill palace, would invite his clergy to sumptuous banquets, make them drunk with Madeira, then order them to jump and run races and promote the winners. He'd force them to mount horses and bet on the result, and the next day preach a sermon in church on the evils of betting - with special reference to the scandalous clerical steeplechase of the previous day! Dromore's Gilhall castle has a famous ghost, first seen by Lady Beresford. It was her childhood weetheart, son of the Earl of Tyrone. Disbelieving that he was a phantom, she challenged him to touch her to prove it, though he warned her: "Madam, the touch of a ghost is no gentle His hand on her wrist "burnt like ice" and shrivelled her sinews which "were all drawn and twisted about." Ever afterwards she had to wear a big black bow on her wrist. The folk there will tell you: "You may not believe in such things, but too many of them happen in Ireland. Did we not have a squire without arms or legs who rode to hounds in a bucket, and was it not all due to the curse of a ghost?" Another anecdote concerns Baronscourt, the Duke of Abercorn's home. A Marquess there heard that his wife was about to elope — and sent her a note saying she should do it in the family coach, for "it should never be said that Lady Abercorn left her husband's home in a hack Blakeston is such a gifted travel-writer that he makes Ulster's attractions irresistible. Most who read his fascinating book will want to go there for their next holiday.

of Guendoline P. Clarke morning — without benefit of home mice and offers them to clergy. A neighbor was busy Taffy. I hope she doesn't feel cutting his lawn when, in a vacant lot that runs at the back of our two properties, he found a collie dog. It was dead very, very dead. We knew it belonged to people on the next road and had been missing for over a week. Poor old Rex, he was fourteen years old, the pet of the family. After his owners had been notified by phone Billy and his father came over. Twelve-year-old Billy was in tears. Why wouldn't he be - he and Rex had grown up together. With the help of Partner and the neighbour who found the dog a grave was dug and Rex buried right on the spot where he died. In the middle of things

Billy's mother came through a gap in our fence. I found her with eyes streaming and hardly able to speak for sobs. Just so much can a dog mean to a fa-mily. Time after time she had told me - "I don't know what we would do if anything ever happened to Rex." Small wonder. Rex always followed Billy to school and afterwards came trotting back alone. Then about three-thirty he would be off on his way home from school. Rex was slow, shaggy, unkempt and half blind. But he belonged to the family and they loved him. Now they are wondering . . . did he die a natural death or was he poisoned? If so, by whom? Can you imagine anyone mean enough to poison a poor old dog wnose only sin was that he sometimes walked across other people's property? Dee and the boys had a similar loss this summer when elevenyear-old Honey developed jaundice and, for fear of infection, the "vet" advised she be put to sleep. She would probably have died anyway. ludicrous by comparison but thank heaven we can still be concerned over the loss of a dog even as we listen to what is taking place in the Congo, in the U.N. Assembly, or in the wake of Hurricanes Donna and Ethel. Surely it is this absorption with apparently unrelated family affairs that helps us to keep both feet on the ground instead of worrying ourselves into a state of nervous exhaustion. I was thinking this when we were visiting friends last week - an intelligent, well-educated much travelled couple, who, from choice, are now trying to make a living from farming but not too successfully. Our conversation during the day did eventually get around to international affairs; to war and the threat of war, but mostly it was about the local drought; fear that the well would give out; uneasiness because they were having to supplement pasture feeding with hay stored in the barn for winter use. Also the advisability of selling calves as vealers or to keep them for baby beef. The price of eggs was also discussed, and the poor
