

Those Space Shots Are Big Business

Former President Eisenhower and the man who has space chief have both taken part in the President Kennedy's man-to-the-moon project.

Speaking at Gettysburg, Penn., the former President called the man-to-the-moon project a sheer waste of money, and said that there were plenty of things to be done on earth before sending a man to the moon.

His space chief, Keith Glennan, speaking the same day in Washington, took much the same position, declaring the moon shot program was excessively expensive and unsure.

And these are not the only respected public figures who have attacked the Kennedy administration's decision to step up the space program and try to put a man on the moon before 1970.

In connection with the Eisenhower - Glennan criticisms, two things have to be remembered. One is that these men possibly could have put up an earth satellite ahead of the Soviets but didn't.

Yet nothing in postwar history did more to build up the prestige of the United States than the world's first satellite, Sputnik I, and no one thing did more to put American prestige into question than the failure to beat the Soviet satellite.

It is not surprising to find those who were cautious about space exploration in the still calling for caution in the '60s. They were satisfied with the United States taking second place in some space projects, but were also the engineers of the program by which the United States now has 23 satellites in space which have sent back more knowledge of space than have Soviet rockets.

The second point to remember is that while this 10-year space program that should have a man on the moon by 1970 is to cost

Flying Power Plant

Electricity and heat for remote areas is the latest thing in nuclear power development. The world's first portable nuclear power plant is shown, above, being loaded into an aircraft transport for shipping from Baltimore, Md., to Warren, Mich. near Sandusky, Wyo., its new location, map right.

The power plant, named the PM-1, perched on its craggy plateau, will serve to light and heat a newly constructed air base, and will generate enough heat to provide a town of 2,000 with summer weather in below-zero winter.

roughly $30,000,000, the country does not save all of that amount if it were to follow the Eisenhower - Glennan advice and pay less attention to the moon.

It's not a case of $30,000,000 for a man-on-the-moon shot; but of $30,000,000 for all of the nation's space exploration for the rest of this decade. That includes putting a few astronauts around the earth, perfecting the missiles and the spacecraft for outer space exploration whether to the moon or farther, developing weather and communication satellite systems — to mention only a few of the things the billions will go for, writes Neal Stanford in the Christian Science Monitor.

Neither former President Eisenhower, nor former space chief Keith Glennan, have argued that the whole space program be dumped. The debate does not signify that the country would have the entire $30,000,000 or what is earmarked for space in this decade to spend for foreign aid, or build roads or schools, or desalting sea water.

What the nation might save, is between $3,000,000,000 and $6,000,000,000 — saved in that it would not be spent before 1970, but might be spent later.

What President Kennedy has done is ask his space experts if by stepping up the program 15 per cent or so the United States has a good chance of putting a man on the moon ahead of the Soviets. The answer he got was "yes," and so he has stepped up the timetable.

What is sometimes overlooked in this debate is the great practical value of the space program already in operation. For example, the Tiros III weather satellite had been aloft only a few hours this week before it was transmitting pictures of storm areas over Newfoundland and the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

As for the Midea satellite that passed over the U.S.S.R. five hours after launching, scanning the Soviet landscape for missile bases and other points of interest, it is no secret the Pentagon is elated over its possibilities as watchdog over certain Soviet military operations.

So far the Kremlin has not objected to the orbiting of these satellites over the U.S.S.R., nor threatened to shoot them down if they develop antisatellite satellites.

With President Eisenhower's agreement to stop U-2 flights over the U.S.S.R., these satellites constitute the West's best chance to know what's going on behind the Iron Curtain.

Weather broadcasters have been comparing this hot spell to that of 1936. I remember that summer. Partner is one of those persons who insists on ignoring the heat. He says keep on working and you don't need to worry. Well, during that hundred degree hot spell we were hoeing turnips in a field behind the house. No shade. I was ready to drop. Finally Partner admitted the sun was a bit strong and said we'd better go into the house for awhile!

There is another thing that worries me during a prolonged hot spell — one seems to waste so much time nowadays. Most of us do what we have to do but after that it is much easier just to sit and wait, or read or watch T.V. than to do a bit of extra sewing or knitting. For that reason I always like to have some summer "pick-up" work ready for the lazy days. This summer my attention for the hospital staff

Some people, who want to "get away from it all" go off for a vacation — to the lake, or a trip to Virginia, or to the Old Country — any place at all that will be a change from everyday living. But we get the same result by staying quietly at home! You see, when everybody else is away from home, it is just like having a holiday! Right now our young ones are at the cottage so they don't come visiting; several neighbour families are also away so there are no little boys and girls around here fighting among themselves or coming across to see what mischief they can get into on our place. We are even saved the necessity of guarding Taffy and Ditto from too much attention. Taffy loves children but the birds would only get them away from us. And we don't mind losing the cherries they don't pick. So we have been keeping an eye on the children and reporting the matter to their respective mothers. Not having to watch them is another kind of holiday.

But eh dear, isn't it hot? Until two weeks ago most of us were complaining because the weather was so cool. But I can't remember that I complained. I knew only too well the time would come when it would be too hot for comfort. And so it is. The only time I have been comfortable during the last week was when I was shopping in an air-conditioned store. Even that has its drawbacks — one feels the heat all the more when one retreats to normal hot and humid air conditions.

Ballot The Key To Negro Rights

There are many Negro leaders, including the Reverend Martin Luther King, who are coming around at last to believe that the ballot is the key to future progress toward racial equality.

There was a long time when these self-same leaders thought the Justice Department was putting too much emphasis on this phrase of the program, and was overlooking the more obvious aspects. But the truth is, they can now see that politicians of the South are no different from those in other regions. They respect and fear the voters. If they have the power to cast, they have the power to drive from office those unregenerate windbags who have for years fattened their ballot boxes with their segregation doctrine.

For a long time it seemed as though the ballot was a long way off for most Negroes. But now there are signs everywhere that the major breakthrough, Administration civil-rights experts are convinced that Negroes are at the edge right now, and that in three years they will be so strong politically, in the South, that the demagogues will have to give up their doctrine of white supremacy.

The signs are many. In Mason County, Alabama, the Justice Department won a federal court order banning delay and obstruction by whites. Since then 100 Negroes have registered, and 670 are on the lists for early action. In Haywood County, Tennessee, the first Negro voters since the Civil War registered a year ago, after a Justice Department suit. Now there are 1,500 registered. Landowners in that county who used strong economic repressive measures against registered Negroes are now seeking a constant settlement suit, convinced that they were wrong.

The spearhead in this progress has been the legal work done by the Justice Department. The law has been effectively applied. In addition, white resistance to the Negro vote is slackening, as it is bound to in a cause that is morally right.

Finally, and probably the most powerful factor of all, is the development of new, young, educated Negro leaders. We have said that the key to this progress is the ballot. But even more basic has been the education of the Negro. That has gradually destroyed the apathy toward voting that has been a different matter. This young leadership among Negroes, while it has been fantastically successful in avoiding overt violence, has been vigorous and articulate. It cannot be denied.

And with sufficient votes to swing an election it will not be many years before even the politicians of Mississippi and Alabama will be singing a different tune, to win the Negro vote.

Hartford Courant.

Next fall has kept me busy. And do you know I have it nearly finished and it has been no effort at all! I keep my multi-colored wool in a special box and take it around with me wherever I go — out to the garden, on the porch, or when I sit down to watch T.V. As I say, it has been no effort at all! I had had to sit at it hour after hour, day after day, that would have been a different matter. Speaking of hospital work one reader wrote saying she, too, would like to do work of that kind and now did one go about it, and was one paid for doing it or was it entirely voluntary? Well, that depends upon our place. We are even saved the necessity of guarding Taffy and Ditto from too much attention. Taffy loves children but the birds would only get them away from us. And we don't mind losing the cherries they don't pick. So we have been keeping an eye on the children and reporting the matter to their respective mothers. ## Modern Etiquette

Q. Just what is the meaning of "semi-formal," as applied to the dress of both men and women?

A. This usually depends upon the community. In some places, where men customarily wear tails, then semi-formal means tuxedos for the men and cocktail dresses for the women. In a simpler community, it would be plain dark blue or grey suit for the men and afternoon dress for the women.

Q. Is it up to the man or the woman, who have just been introduced, to say, "I'm glad to have met you," when leaving each other?

A. The man should take the initiative, while the woman responds with a smile and "Thank you."

Q. Is a hostess supposed to wait until all her guests have finished eating before beginning to move the plates from the table?

A. Usually, yes. However, if one of her guests is "picky" about eating, it would be all right, in consideration of other guests, for her to begin removing some of the plates from the table.

He Paints WITH A Nude Model

Covered in paint, the nude girl squirmed, wriggled and crawled around the huge canvas, obeying the directions of a man perched on a stepladder.

This was painter Yves Klein of Paris at work. Not for him the slow laboured application of paint, stroke by stroke with a fine brush. Nor the mixing of countless shades and colours.

He sits there on his ladder or stands beside the canvas, calling such instructions as "exert more lateral pressure," and "wiggle your knees." And the girl, with nothing but a rapidly diminishing coating of paint to save her modesty, obeys.

Not unexpectedly, Klein achieves some startling results. None of his daubs is identifiable, but they find a ready market at prices ranging up to $1200.

Klein's artistic talent came to light only a few years ago. Before that he tried to train racehorses in Ireland and he was a judo wrestler in Japan.

After he had been thrown by both horses and Japanese, he decided there had to be an easier way of earning a living.

He began his artistic career in the conventional manner, but soon decided that to use brushes was slow and tedious. He graduated to a small paint roller, thence to a large one. This way he could cover a large canvas in ninety seconds flat.

His favourite colour is I.K.B. — International Klein Blue, which, to the uninitiated, is a bluish green.

Klein produced one of his works by covering a canvas with his roller. He then draped it over his car. Then he drove it through a rainstorm. The result he called "The Wind of the Voyage."

Inspired by this, he smeared another canvas with several colours, and drove through another storm. This piece he called "Imagination."

Klein was doing well but not too well enough. He wanted to revolutionize art, to take Paris by storm.

That was when he thought of his living brush. Using this technique, Klein describes himself as

Each year, hundreds of epileptics and diabetics found unconscious by the police are tossed into jail as "drunks," some die before they get to hospital. Thousands of people are allergic to penicillin — an injection can produce fatal shock — if given an anti-tetanus injection. Yet penicillin and anti-tetanus are given routinely in the emergency treatment of accident victims.

To forestall the useless deaths which result from this state of affairs, Dr. Marion Collins, a Tulare, Calif., surgeon, started a unique service five years ago called the Medic-Alert Foundation. For $5, this non-profit group sends subscribers a silver bracelet engraved in red on one side and such warnings as "diabetic" on the other. The other day, Medic-Alert got a seal of approval from California's director of public health. The bracelets, wrote Dr. Malcom Merrill, "are a useful and practical approach to a significant medical problem." So far, more than 60,000 people wear them.

Dr. Collins started Medic-Alert after his daughter nearly died from a reaction to anti-tetanus. He took the bracelets, and is allergic anti-coagulants, and is allergic to Demerol. "I think I can save more lives with Medic-Alert than I ever have or ever could in the operating room," he said.
