What is happening to the fo eign policy of Peking? A tired dragon is showing a wan and forced smile. It appears chiefly on the face of the foreign minister, Marshal Chen. Some weeks ago he began spreading a nev something approaching apference on Laos. He himself ex-

Since then information ha been coming in from many directions to confirm this. The best formation available to the United States Government from a fresh survey of the situation now caps the various private sources of information. Comm ist China, it indicates, is in a much worse plight, a much more serious breakdown of its administrative and industrial as well a its farm systems, than the out side world had recognized.

There is no visible rebellion either new or in sight for the future, although there is speculation on what might happen is an army almost entirely of peasants were to ferment. Patience is ingrained to a pitiful degree China. A Washington official s quoted by the New York Times as saying the reaction in China to the spreading breakdown, malnutrition, stoppages of industry for lack of materials, return to the country of many who went to the city for succor, tion, demoralization, despondency, and despair." Ill feeling toward the Soviet Union stems in part from this situation. At Geneva Marshall Chen went so far as to tell a Moscow had let the Commun Supporting information from the Communist Chinese press indi cates that the Russian leaders continue to exact payments fo earlier aid to China, despite China's desperate scramble for foreign exchange to buy food abroad. A slight easing toward cording to an editorial in the Christian Science Monitor. In an interview with the Swiss radio, Marshal Chen said it was "rather nice" of President Kennedy to give assurances to Peking that he would not permit the Chinese Nationalists to start war in the Formosa Strait. And back in China he said at a party that he had assured Secr State Dean Rusk that China would not upset the agreement to neutralize Laos.

Right now they face what looks — for the present anyhow - like something far more than a series of famines: like the failure of communism as a system They could act in desperation and try to distract local wrath nately they seem to realize they watches and is glad the Chinese Communist leaders are too proud, apparently, to ask for food and other help, to bail out their hard-pressed system. This is a time to let the Communists live with the flaws in their dogma and hopefully to loosen its

Communism may be going through extremely grave re-verses or actually failing; we cannot say. In either case, and for whatever reasons of dissimulation, we are glad to see a smile however rueful or transient. It is far preferable to the madness which could erupt from so severe a national frustration.

struggle for human security than the fact that, in 122 years of operation, the Cunard line has never lost a single passen-ger's life through accident or eglect. And this has been against that stupendous and Atlantic Ocean. Warren Tute's history of steam navigation on those waters, "Atlantic Conuest," is co npact, balanced, and ramatic. Lieutenant Commard-Tute, R.V. (Ret.) is a sea vriter and novelist of zest and ctness ('The Cruiser," "The Rock," "Leviathan") and a literary voyage with Tute at the elm is efficient business.

Fortunately, he is no taciturn ther men. Thus "Atlantic Conally a story of human skills and spirit and the great ocean is made to yield to the puny strength of man - much of the time. Steam power was early regarded as a foolish presumption over sail, but wooden paddle-wheelers slowly broke the prejidice. In 1819 the 300-ton auxiliary steam packet Savannah reached Liverpool from New York in 27 days and fifteen ours (steaming 80 hours of the way). Her instigators have been orgotten and she drew curiosity but as a business venture she was a flop; this, however, was the first crossing of a major ocean by a steam-engined ship. Next, in 1838, the little Sirius of the British and American line conceived by an American, Dr. Junius Smith) steamed into New York from England, a few hours ahead of the much larger, 1,340 - ton British - owned Great Western, designed by the "little giant" engineer, Isambard Kingproduce the first iron steamship driven by propeller

In 1840 the Cunard crowd was in action with three steamships. This was a stellar group of men headed by Samuel Cunard, a solid Quaker merchant and ship-owner from Halifax, N.S., and Robert Napier, the scrupula Scottish builder who may be garded as the father of Clydeside ship engineering. Safety was their cry, and safety was their reward.

The list of great Atlantic enrepreneurs goes on. In 1850 Edward Knight Collins, a Cape Cod sailing scion and pioneer of high speed, took the mythical Blue Riband for Atlantic speed from
