

The coastal strips of Greenland are very unlike what most of us suppose. Even in midwinter the climate is not really so cold as that of the northern United States, and in summer can be very (though never disagreeably) hot, so that people are swimming in lakes and wading about in shorts even as far north as upper Baffin Bay. There are places within the Arctic Circle that have recorded temperatures of over one hundred degrees. While the steeper mountains are either arc, or may appear to be bare and rather grim, most of them are covered with lichens and mosses, and the lowland are carpeted with flowers.

The most interesting part of the trip was the last day, when the eastern fare runner from Cape Brewster, north of Iceland and south of Jan Mayen Land, north of the Arctic Circle, was boarded. This is a rugged and isolated coast with numerous glaciers and huge fjords cut into towering cliffs. The vegetation consists of low-lying shrubs and lichens. The mountains are covered with lichen and filled with nothing but boulders and stones. Here geology is in complete, bare, and desolate isolation. Glaciation, and glacial retreat may be seen and understood by anyone in the manner it is portrayed in the pictures. It is observed into perfect U-shaped valleys by gouging ice, and there are huge cirques hanging over the cliffs. Froth is spilling over their edges in w-mountain cascades like corn on a hot bowl, or dead and dry grass on a hot pan. The words from the Continent "We Live On," Ivan T. Sanderson.

Countries possessing status up to about 20 miles wide, so far unswum by humans, can be pretty sure that New Zealanders will be prepared to consider swimming them. It is invited. Since New Zealander Barry Davison, the recent hero, and historic "first ever" swimmer of hazardous, windy Cook Strait in 1979, has now led New Zealand expert swimmers have been looking for other equally difficult swims to swim, preferably the unswum sort.

Barrie Davenport said the he had been awarded Cook Strait for his service in the Foveaux Strait but had not been informed of details. A Southland newspaper reported that he had been awarded the big Cook Strait trophy, after his congratulating him.

Some New Zealand experts considered that a swimmer crossing Cook Strait could not plan to swim in the Foveaux Strait, a six and one-half hours. Barrie crossing time of 11 hours 13 minutes, and the cold waters of Cook Strait astounded the experts. He tributed this amazing endurance

The first New Zealander being taken to the United States in 1840 was a young man named John Williams. He was a member of the Wesleyan Mission Society and was sent to the United States to preach the Gospel. Williams was a very popular preacher and was able to attract large crowds of people to his sermons. He was also a very good writer and published several books on his travels. Williams was one of the first New Zealanders to be taken to the United States and his story is a very interesting one.

By midafternoon, Barrie was within five miles of his southern objective when he had to be carried off course by a strong ebb tide. This was the kind of obstacle that had turned back on his earlier attempt when he was much closer to victory. From the bow of a patrol boat, Margaret Devenport had watched her husband encouraging every inch of the way, but while he was now driving in a steep, choppy sea at a steady 54 strokes per minute, he seemed to be making no headway.

As Pattie Smyth swings his 10-car train into the elevated curve at Smith and Ninth Streets in New York City there's just before plunging down into the subway tunnel, he looks back across Broadway to see if anyone has crossed the water of New York Harbor with the Statue of Liberty standing out prominently on his horizon.

This is the moment twice each workday which Pattie treasures most. Most of the rest of his life will be the longest subway run in the world, 25.7 miles between Coney Island and Grand Central underground.

But he says he likes his job, in spite of the shortage of sunbathing time. He wears his pocketbook, passengers standing hair-raisingly close to the platform edge. Bowlers are leaning over the railing, peering along side the tracks and other irregularities which any commuter taking Trans-Hudson's morning train is subjected to, and must take as a matter of routine.

"Or those Bowlers who come out of their warm stations right on the tracks under the bridge," he adds.

"Now that we've lights in the station spot them a long way off."

Pattie also keeps for track walkers, "who don't respect the rules." He asks them what they carry right to themselves. Pattie would spot them even in light. Darker days, he goes through the darkness to see things quickly and get them out of the hands of the Christian Science.

Pattie, who has been married over 20 years, is not particularly being it or thinking about it.

"When I'm on my train," he said as he took his train out of a mid-Manhattan station the other day. "At first when you get the training, you don't stop worrying. You drive that train even in your dreams."

"But when you get the hang of it, it don't bother you any more a bit."

The profusion of multicolored signal lights, the numbers, and from nowhe and going nowhere, the deafening noise and the seemingly high speeds (the trains rarely ever reach 50 mph on a long, straight run) are anything but peaceful.

To Pattie, however, this subterranean universe is a well-ordered thing.
