

From Brock, Saskatchewan, we headed West (Sept. 8) and at nightfall found lodgings in Kindersley. Kindersley is a fine town but the innkeepers there have hardly kept pace with the refinements found in other places. It was not as bad as it may sound, however. The heavy sleepers dozed peacefully but the lighter sleepers had to contend with the celebrations of a few harvesters who had, probably, just completed their combining and were living it up. This could be cause for celebration.

From Kindersley the move was to Calgary, Alberta. A three hundred mile stretch. A time change between Kindersley, Sask. and Calgary, Alberta, allowed us to arrive there before noon and we had a couple of hours to observe the new found affluence of the ones equally beautiful but it will be denied to the public until June 1st next year.

Although we had travelled from Kindersley, Sask., this morning we found we still had a couple of hours of travelling time and decided to move on toward Field B.C. We reached there in no time flat, seemed, and continued on toward Golden. The forty or fifty miles between these two places is a trip that would raise the hair on anyone's neck. The highway winds around the mountains where the edge drops off sharply to a depth of two or three thousand feet. The driver, as we can attest, finds himself holding on to the wheel like a vice. The palms of the hands become moist and the heart palpitation exhilarates like an overworked motor.

We made it to Golden, B.C. Thank the good Lord. To night we are bedded down in a beautiful hotel, called the Mountain Inn. The scenery from our window is something we wish everyone of our readers could see. We won't write it here. Tomorrow we expect it will be just as lovely. As we travel, we shouldn't have it so good. More next week.

Most people who receive from a first heart attack return to their old jobs.
