Quality Strawberries

One of the surest and most popular signs that summer is really here is the arrival of local strawberries in the stores.

Dr. W.D. Evans, Department of Horticulture, Ontario Agricultural College, University of Guelph, says that early indications suggest a good crop this year, and that Redcoat will be the most common variety on the market. Two varieties called Veestar and Vibrant have been introduced from the Vineland Research Station within the last two years; both are considered good for processing.

Strawberry plants from as far afield as Finland, Gorman, Afghanistan, Assam, China, Korea and Ecuador are being crossed by Dr. Evans. It is hoped that these experiments will produce better varieties for both the commercial grower and the home gardener. High quality, late fruiting plants have already been selected for their commercial potential, and sparse running, everbearing plants have been selected for further testing as possible home garden varieties.

Work is also underway to produce varieties with specific characteristics. Through a breeding method known as determining the propensity of characters, varieties are bred that have a better fruit flavor than the average, or are larger in size, or more disease resistant. It is hoped strawberries can eventually be produced that can combine many characteristics that are desirable both for the grower and consumer.

Dr. Evans says that plants that will make strawberry harvesting easier are being bred. While much berry picking is still done by hand, developments in machine harvesting ensure that
