and low-lead gasoline these days. I've noticed that most of them cost a little more money, though. Just how good a buy are they? Should I be using them?

Dear L. G.:
As to whether you should be using the new lead-free and low-lead gasoline recently introduced to many parts of the country, it depends on the type of automobile you drive. Most of the new gasoline blends were developed for the 1971 models.

Generally speaking, if you are driving a small compact car with a low-compression ratio engine, you can probably use a lead-free gasoline. Other cars previously using regular grade gas can usually use the low-lead blends.

If you're driving a high-compression powered car, however, chances are you can't use the new gasoline. Your service station should be able to tell you which gasoline is best suited to your car and driving needs.

Incidentally, these lead-free gasoline aren't exactly new. Some have been available for years in certain parts of the country. As to whether the new gasoline are a good buy or not, that's up to you. The mixtures were developed to help reduce the level of pollutants emitted by our automobiles and thus help reduce air pollution. Smog is a problem today no matter where you live.

The new gasoline are also designed to help you get better mileage by contributing to a cleaner burning engine. You'll have to decide if these advantages are worth a slight increase in cost.
