Gelatin is a protein food consisting of 17 amino acids. It comes from the chief part of the bones, skin and white connective tissues of animals that is called "collagen." This is the protein that yields gelatin.

A booklet from Knox gelatin says the process of cooking the jelly from bones was first used in about 1682 by a Frenchman named Denis Papin.

When you use gelatin, you must first dissolve it completely. Check it by tilting the saucepan you've put it in to see if there are granules still clinging to the side or bottom of the pan.

If you want to add food to gelatin, chill it to the consistency of unbeaten egg white first. If solid ingredients are added to a mixture that is too thin, they will sink or float. If they are added to a mixture that has been chilled too long and is starting to get lumpy, there is the possibility that the finished mold will fall apart.

If whipped cream is added to a thin mixture, the finished gel is apt to divide into clear and creamy layers. If it is added to a thick mixture, there are apt to be lumps of gelatin mixture in the finished gel, which might collapse.

Before you fold in beaten egg whites, gelatin mixtures need to be chilled until the mixture mounds slightly when it is dropped from a spoon. That means it is thicker than unbeaten egg white.

When you tip some of the mixture off a spoon it will mound or form a slight puddle on top of the surface of the gelatin mixture instead of disappearing immediately.

When you chill a gelatin mixture, stir it occasionally so that the chilling will be uniform and the mixture won't get around the outside before the center begins to thicken.

If a mixture is chilled for too long and gets too thick or solid, simply place the pan over low heat and stir the mixture until it melts and is smooth. Then chill again.

It may help to set a timer to ring at five-or-10-minute intervals if you are busy and may forget.

Chilling a gelatin dish until it is firm means chilling it until it is set or stiff enough. The length of time required depends on how large a mold or dish is
