Are Grass Fires Really Necessary?

The Jarvis Record, Thursday, March 25, 1971 — 7

last week it was drifting next week it may be fires. Both are strongly encouraged by the wind. The spring fire danger is so closely on the heels of late winter blizzards we could be lulled into a sense of safety. Light fires such as grass and leaves, and a few hours of rain and wind can lower moisture content to the point that ignition is easy and there are many hazards. Uncontrolled and uncolled. Fire may be trees, shrubs, fence posts, and buildings, or escape to run wild and cause heavy damage at home or on neighboring land. Every fire is potentially dangerous. The following guidelines will help to reduce this danger:

— Check with your local township office to learn of the by-laws controlling the setting of fires.

— Notify your local fire department when you plan to undertake a burning operation.

— Burn only when the wind is calm in the late afternoon and evening. Wind usually freshens in the morning and dies down in the afternoon.

— Have as much manpower on the scene as possible — family, friends, neighbors.

— Build fire breaks around the area to be burned and back fire if possible.

— Keep tractor and plough handy. This is one of the best tools to control grass fires on arable land.

— Burn the area in small sections, one at a time.

— Know where you can obtain assistance should the fire get out of hand.

Some of these points may help you to have a safe clean-up operation this spring, but before you strike the match . . . IS THIS FIRE REALLY NECESSARY?
