Blaming The Sun

Intensified solar activity may lead to more deaths from heart disease. That word comes from the Soviet Union.

The findings are reported in a Soviet scientific journal, Earth and the Universe, in an outline of research conducted by scientists in that country.

The report says the research also indicates there is a relationship between health and solar activity. The magazine says the studies show that magnetic storms in the atmosphere due to solar flares affect both healthy people and invalids.

The scientists found that the conditions of healthy individuals returned to normal quickly after these storms. But sick organisms took much longer to heal and sometimes never made full recovery.

The findings may be dismaying to those suffering from heart disease. The Earth and the Universe notes that there is a bright aspect in the situation. It says if magnetic storms could be predicted accurately and in good time, measures could be taken to protect those who were sick, including medical treatment.

The article says figures for sudden deaths from heart disease in the city of Sverdlovsk in the Urals during the period 1944-66 showed their incidents was closely related to the extent of corpuscular radiation — streams of electrically charged particles emitted by the sun and solar flares.

The article offered no theory to explain the phenomenon.

A TRIP TO PEI

This year I took a vacation and went to Prince Edward Island. I went to Montreal by bus and train (the CN Rapido) and my brother and his wife picked me up and we drove in his car through Quebec, Vermont, New Hampshire, New Brunswick, Maine to the ferry, stopping overnight at motels. We crossed to the island on the ferry and drove to "Shining Waters Lodge" where we stayed a couple of weeks. This is in Cavendish. By the way, we took a side trip round the Cabot Trail in Nova Scotia. The scenery of mountain and sea is really magnificent — so is the scenery in the White Mountains in New Hampshire. However, one does get a little tired of driving through miles and miles of trees.

The first thing that strikes a person as he reaches the island is the red soil — everything is red, soil and rocks. But the novelty soon passes off. PEI is essentially a farming and fishing country and the countryside is dotted with small hamlets, each about three times the size of Garnet. Each has a dozen or so houses, a bridge over a river, or arm of the sea, a church, school and a community hall. There are, of course, larger villages also and some fair sized towns. The capital is Charlottetown, a city of about 130,000, which has many industries and a modern and very busy downtown area. The next largest town, Summerside, is about half the size. Cavendish itself is not a village, just an area. It does contain a very interesting Wax Museum. I have seen Madame Tussauds original and I think this is quite as good — but no Chamber of Horrors!

Here are some items of special interest. The most outstanding is the Woodleigh Replicas. These are stone laid cement models of famous buildings. Two of them Dunvegan Castle and the Tower of London, are large enough to enter, the others, such as York Minster and Shakespeare's birthplace, are smaller. In the capital itself the atrociously ugly building put up to celebrate Canada's Centennial is right beside the beautiful old Legislative Building, which contains the table where the Confederation of Canada was drawn up. The new building is quite nice inside and contains a very good theatre. A different kind of highlight is the Wildlife Park, which contains a wide variety of Canadian wild animals and birds, all alive, including one moose and some caribou. Here is a large pool for seals. These animals jump right out of the water to get fish, held by the visitor. As they sink back in to the water the donor gets generously splashed.

We also saw the three plays put on in the Theatre. These are: "Jane Eyre," "Mary Queen of Scots" and "Ann of Green Gables." This last one is by Lucy Maude Montgomery, who is the "P...on Saint" of the Island.

STUDYING PESTICIDE RESIDUES

The Canadian agricultural industry has not been dragging its feet in restricting the use of chemical pesticides," says Dr. C. R. Harris.

Dr. Harris is a scientist at Canada Agriculture's London Research Institute at London, Ont. He says many of the restrictions that have been introduced in recent years are based, in part, on research conducted by the Canada Department of Agriculture.
